1931. The revolution in Spain (p. 982) ushered in a policy of anti-clericalism on the part of the republican government and so added yet another problem to those already weighing on the papacy.
Here again the pope issued protests and, in order to make clear the sympathy of the Church with the needs and aspirations of the lower classes, published

May 15. An important encyclical, Quadragesimo anno, to supplement the famous encyclical Rerum novarum of Leo XIII (1891). The pope called for social and economic reform, condemned the maldistribution of wealth, and strongly urged fundamental changes to give the worker a fairer share in the product of his labor. At the same time he once more condemned communism and socialism.

1933, July 20. Conclusion of the concordat with the National Socialist government of Germany. Although the position of the Church was carefully defined, the anti-clericalism, not to say the atheism and neo-paganism of the new régime in Germany was so strong that conflict was almost inevitable. The Nazi threat to the Church was seen to be no less serious than that from communism. The Church fought for its position as well as it could, but there was no real amelioration of the situation, and the German annexation of Austria, a purely Catholic state, in Mar. 1938, made conditions if anything even worse.

1936, July. The outbreak of the civil war in Spain appeared to promise a reaction against the anti-clericalism of the republican régime. The pope therefore supported Gen. Franco and recognized the Insurgent régime (Aug. 27, 1937). when Pius XI died (Feb. 10, 1939) the Spanish situation was as yet undecided and the world was rent by the conflict of fascism and democracy and communism. In the midst of this confusion the position of the Church had become extremely precarious, but the pontiff had earned world-wide respect for the firmness of his stand against any régime threatening religion or the fundamental rights of the individual (i.e. his condemnation of the racial policies of Germany and Italy).

1939, Mar. 2. PIUS XII (Eugenio Pacelli) was elected pope. He had served for years as papal secretary of state and chief adviser to Pius XI and was generally recognized as a man of strong will, combined with great astuteness and diplomatic skill. He devoted himself at once to efforts for the pacification of Europe, but for the rest introduced no basic change of policy.

7. SWITZERLAND

1914, Aug. 1. The Swiss Confederation mobilized its forces in view of the international crisis and remained on a war footing throughout the conflict. Aug. 4 the government announced its neutrality, and its readiness to defend it no doubt had something to do with respect for Swiss territory on both sides. Naturally the great conflict led to a certain degree of tension between the French and the Germanspeaking cantons. For the rest the war resulted in ever-increasing authority of the federal as against the cantonal governments (the Federal Council was given exceptional powers Aug. 3, 1914). Switzerland suffered much from food shortage and was obliged to establish highly centralized control of economic activity. The demands of the combatants and the need for food resulted in a striking development of Swiss industry, with a corresponding growth of industrial labor and a spread of socialist and radical thought. By the end of the war the social tension had reached the point where

1918, Nov. 12. A general strike was attempted. This, however, ended in grievous failure. Bourgeois and democratic elements were more than ever on their guard, and

Dec. 8. Switzerland broke off relations with Soviet Russia, which was suspected of subversive propaganda. To date the Swiss government has refused recognition of the new régime in Russia.

1919, Apr. 11. Geneva was chosen as the seat of the League of Nations. The Swiss, though long interested in international collaboration, were nevertheless primarily concerned with maintenance of their neutrality, and were anxious to avoid dangerous commitments. When,

Apr. 11. The people of Vorarlberg voted by a large majority for union with Switzerland, the federal government ignored the opportunity to extend the confederation. By the

June 28. Treaty of Versailles the powers recognized the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland, while the Swiss gave up their treaty right to occupy northern Savoy in the event of war (this right or obligation had not been exercised). The intricate problem of the free zones of Upper Savoy and Gex, so important for the defense of Geneva, was left to direct Franco-Swiss negotiations.

Nov. 19. The Swiss parliament voted to join the League of Nations, but the federal government first secured from the League Council

1920, Feb. 13. The Declaration of London, by which the League Council agreed that Switzerland should not be obliged to take part in military sanctions under the terms of the Covenant. Thereupon

Mar. 8. Switzerland formally joined the League. Nevertheless, a plebiscite arranged to decide the issue, on .May 16. Showed a vote of only 416,000 in favor as against 323,000 opposed.

1921, Aug. 7. Agreement with France with respect to the free zones. Switzerland agreed to give up former treaty rights, but this arrangement was repudiated by a Swiss plebiscite (Feb. 18, 1923). Thereupon the French government took unilateral action, moving its customs stations forward to the political frontier (Nov. 10, 1923). The Swiss government protested and it was finally decided to investigate the legal aspects of the problem and to arbitrate the dispute (Oct. 30, 1924, Mar. 18, 1925).

1923, Mar. 29. Conclusion of a customs union between Switzerland and the little principality of Liechtenstein, which before the war had been closely associated with Austria-Hungary. The Swiss government was henceforth to operate the postal and telegraph services, and to protect the foreign interests of Liechtenstein.

May 10. V. V. Vorovsky, Russian delegate to the Lausanne Conference (p. 1095), was assassinated by Maurice Conradi, a Swiss who had suffered under the Soviet régime in Russia. Conradi was acquitted by the courts (Nov. 16) and the whole incident brought Switzerland and Russia to a state of extreme tension. The questions arising from the Vorovsky affair were settled only in 1927 (Apr. 15), but even that did not signify a great improvement in relations.

1930, Apr. 13. The Swiss and French governments having failed to reach agreement on the free zones, the Permanent Court of International Justice was appealed to and arranged for new discussions (Apr. 13, 1931). These too having broken down (July), the court took matters into its own hands and 1932, June 7. Decided the question in favor of Switzerland. The French government was directed to withdraw its customs stations by Jan. 1, 1034.

Geneva resulted from the growing pressure of the world crisis. The police fired upon a crowd of demonstrating socialists, killing twelve persons. The radical leader, Deputy Nicolle, was arrested, and an attempt to proclaim a general strike (Nov. 12) came to nothing. The government now proceeded with ever-greater vigor against all extremists.

1933, May 12. The wearing of party uniforms was forbidden.

Oct. 14. The Federal Council was again given authority to legislate by decree in economic matters.

1934. The Swiss government bitterly opposed the admission of Russia to the League of Nations, and voted against it in the League Council.

1935, Feb. 24. By plebiscite the people voted to extend the period of military training. In view of the rapidly growing international tension, the Swiss began to feel extremely uneasy, and therefore embarked upon an extensive armament program (June 5, 1936) which involved thorough modernization of frontier defenses, mechanization of army units, development of air defense, etc.

1936, Feb. 4. Assassination of the National Socialist leader Gustloff by a Jew, at Davos. The government at once forbade continuation of a national organization of National Socialists. Protests of the German government and rapid development of ill-feeling between the two countries. In the eyes of the Germans the one redeeming feature was the valiant struggle which the Swiss government continued to wage against communism (new measures of suppression, Nov. 3). In some cantons the Communist Party was entirely forbidden.

Sept. 26. The government decided to devalue the Swiss franc, in keeping with the policy of France. This step led to a marked economic revival.

it had taken part in economic sanctions against Italy during the Ethiopian crisis (p. 964), decided to recognize the Italian conquest. The ill-concealed aspirations of the Fascists to the Italian-speaking cantons of Switzerland, the conclusion of the Berlin-Rome Axis, and the collapse of the system of collective security made it essential for the Swiss government to avoid pressing matters to the limit.

Dec. 7. Romansch was recognized as a fourth national (though not official) language. This was a step designed to win renewed support from the cantons most directly exposed to Italian designs.

1938, Apr. 30. The government appealed to the Council of the League of Nations to recognize Switzerland's unconditional neutrality, pointing out the great change that had come over Europe since 1919 and stressing the particularly exposed position of Switzerland between the League powers and those of the Rome-Berlin Axis. The League Council accepted the Swiss view (May 14), thus freeing Switzerland from all obligation to take part even in economic sanctions against a future ag-The federal government at once brought this new situation to the attention of the German and Italian governments, which, by exchange of notes of June 21, expressed their appreciation and undertook to "acknowledge and respect" the complete neutrality of the confederation.

8. GREATER GERMANY

a. THE GERMAN REICH

1918, Oct. 28. Mutiny of sailors at Kiel, caused by orders from the admiralty to go to sea and fight the British. "Further than Heligoland we will not go."

Oct. 29. Emperor William II, alarmed at demands in the Reichstag for his abdication, left Berlin for army headquarters at Spa.

Nov. 4 and 5. The revolt at Kiel spread to other scaports. Councils of workers and soldiers formed.

Nov. 7. Revolt at Munich, led by Kurt Eisner, an independent socialist, led to the proclamation of a republic in Bavaria (Nov. 8). Similar outbreaks in other cities throughout Germany.

Nov. 8. The emperor refused a demand of the Majority Socialists that he abdicate, and rejected advice from the cabinet of Prince Max of Baden that he do so to save the nation from civil war.

Nov. 9. ABDICATION OF THE EM-PEROR announced in Berlin by Prince Max. REPUBLIC PROCLAIMED by Scheidemann. Government turned over to Majority Socialists, led by Friedrich Ebert and Philip Scheidemann. The emperor fled to Holland in his special train. Allowed to cross the frontier by order of Oueen Wilhelmina after some hours of delay. His abdication was not signed until Nov. 28, by which time all other German rulers had abdicated. This revolution in Germany made it impossible to resist armistice terms offered by the Allies, and accepted Nov. 11. A joint ministry of Inde-Nov. 10. pendent and Majority Socialists took control in Berlin. Struggle between the extreme Left, or Spartacist, group, led by Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, who favored a communist régime, and the Social Democrats (Majority Socialists), who wanted a gradual and not a violent abandonment of capitalism.

Nov. 25. A conference of representatives of the new state governments met at Berlin and decided that a National Constituent Assembly should be elected.

Dec. 16. A congress of workmen's and soldiers' councils at Berlin refused to invite Liebknecht and Luxemburg to take part, showing that the masses favored the moderate policy of the Majority Socialists. The Spartacists opposed the plan of a National Assembly.

1919, Jan. 5-15. Spartacist revolt in Berlin, crushed by the provisional government with the aid of the regular The Independent Socialists sided with the Spartacists, now avowed communists. Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht were killed while under arrest (Jan. 15).

Jan. 19. Election of members of a national assembly, to draw up a constitution. The Communists refused to take part, but all the other groups both Right and Left were represented. Majority Socialists won 163 seats, Center 88, Democrats 75, Nationalists 42, Independent Socialists 22, others 31.

Feb. 6- National Assembly met at Wei-It was controlled by a coalition of Majority Socialists, Center Party, and Democrats, led by Scheidemann.

Feb. 11. Friedrich Ebert chosen as first President of the German Republic, by the National Assembly.

Feb.-Mar. Further communist uprisings in Berlin, Munich, etc., suppressed by Gustav Noske, acting for the government.

Feb. 21. Assassination of Kurt Eisner, by a conspiracy to re-establish the monarchy.

Apr. 4-May 1. Soviet Republic established in Bavaria. This was overthrown by armed forces of the federal government.

June 1. Proclamation of a Rhineland Republic, instigated and supported by France. After some months the movement collapsed because of the hostility of the inhabitants.

June 20. The Scheidemann ministry resigned rather than sign the peace treaty dictated by the Allies.

June 21. The German fleet was scuttled at Scapa Flow, by its crews.

June 23. The new cabinet, under Gustav Bauer (Matthias Erzberger, vice-chancellor; Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau, foreign minister), accepted the peace treaty unconditionally after the Weimar Assembly had voted 237 to 138 for conditional acceptance, in order to avoid invasion of the country. In this way the Majority Socialists and Liberals who controlled the Assembly assumed the odium for the hated treaty.

July 12. The Allied blockade was finally lifted, after a large part of the population had been reduced to the verge of starvation.

July 31. ADOPTION OF THE WEI-MAR CONSTITUTION. president, elected for a 7-year term, was to appoint a chancellor who in turn chose a cabinet which could command a majority in the Reichstag. By Arts. 25 and 48 the president was empowered to suspend constitutional guaranties and dissolve the Reichstag in periods of national emergency. The Reichsrat, composed of delegates from 18 states (no one of which was to have more than two-fifths of the seats), could delay but not prevent legislation. The members of the Reichslag were elected, not as individuals or as representatives of districts. but by party lists for all Germany. system of proportional representation insured the representation of minority parties, but also necessitated coalition governments.

Sept. 22. The government was obliged by the Allies to strike out provision for the representation of Austria and to promise to respect Austrian independence.

The government ordered the evacuation of Latvia by Gen. von der Goltz and his corps, at the command of the Allies.

1920, Feb. 10. Plebiscite in the northern zone of Schleswig resulted in a vote for Denmark. The plebiscite in the southern zone (Mar. 14) was in favor of Germany.

Feb. 12. French troops and the Allied commission of control took charge in Upper Silesia.

Mar. 13-17. KAPP PUTSCH, a monarchical coup, led to seizure of government buildings in Berlin. The government fled to Stuttgart, but the movement collapsed as result of a general strike of the trade unions.

Mar. 19. A great Spartacist rising took place in the Ruhr mining districts.

Mar. 26. Resignation of the Bauer cabinet. A new ministry was formed by Hermann Müller.

Apr. 3. Government troops, having entered the Ruhr, put down the revolt with great severity.

Apr. 6-May 17. French troops occupied Frankfurt and some of the Ruhr towns as a reply to invasion of the Ruhr by German government troops.

Apr. 30. Union of eight central German states to form the new state of Thuringia.

June 6. General elections, to replace the National Assembly by a regular Reichstag. The Weimar coalition lost its majority and a new coalition was formed of the l'eople's l'arty (Liberal), Center, and Democrats. The Müller cabinet resigned (June 8) and a new government was formed by Konstantin Fehrenbach, leader of the Center Party (June 25). The Socialists were excluded.

July 5-16. Spa Conference (p. 957).

The Germans signed a protocol of disarmament and arranged for coal deliveries.

July 11. A plebiscite in Allenstein and Marienwerder resulted in a large majority for Germany.

Sept. 20. By decision of the League, Eupen and Malmedy were turned over to Belgium. Five-sixths of the 600,000 inhabitants were German-speaking. The peace treaty did not provide for a plebiscite, but only gave the inhabitants six months to register their preference publicly.

Nov. 9. Danzig proclaimed a free city, as provided for in the peace treaty. It was placed under protection of the League.

1921, Mar. 8. Allied occupation of Düsseldorf, Duisburg, and Ruhrort, because of alleged German default in reparations payments.

Mar. 20. Plebiscite in Upper Silesia, in favor of Germany.

May 2. Korfanty and the Poles started a rising in Upper Silesia.

May 4. Resignation of Fehrenbach.
A new ministry was formed by Julius Wirth (May 10).

May 11. Germany accepted the Allied reparations terms (p. 957).

July 16. Trial of war criminals at Leipzig.

Aug. 29. Assassination of Matthias Erzberger by reactionary conspirators, who escaped.

Oct. 12. Award of the League of Nations in the Upper Silesian question (p. 957).

1922, Apr. 16. Treaty of Rapallo with Russia (p. 958).

June 24. Assassination of Walther Rathenau, Jewish industrialist and cabinet minister, by reactionary nationalists. The assassins committed suicide and their accomplices were mildly dealt with by the government.

June 30. Membership in monarchist organizations made a criminal offense.

Aug. Beginning of the collapse of the mark, due to heavy reparations payments.

Nov. 14. Resignation of the Wirth cabinet. A new government was formed by Wilhelm Cuno, an influential industrialist.

1923, Jan. 11. OCCUPATION OF THE RUHR, after Germany had been declared in default (p. 958). The government suspended all deliveries to the Allies, but the Franco-Belgian Commission arrested the recalcitrant mine-owners and took over mines and railroads. The government supported the population in a policy of passive resistance.

Aug. 12. Resignation of Cuno. A new cabinet was formed by Gustav Stresemann, leader of the People's Party. He was supported by the Socialists, Center, and Democratic Parties.

Sept. 26. The government ended passive resistance.

Oct. 21. A Rhineland Republic was proclaimed at Aix-la-Chapelle, with Belgian and French support. The government was faced also with communist troubles in Saxony and with monarchical plots in Bavaria.

in Munich, occasioned by the general crisis resulting from the Ruhr occupation and the financial collapse. Field Marshal von Ludendorff and Adolf Hitler, leader of a growing National Socialist Party, attempted to overthrow the Bavarian government. The rising was poorly organized and was easily put down. Hitler was arrested and sentenced to five years in prison. While serving his term he wrote Mein Kampf, a book outlining his career, his theories, and his program. He was released after serving less than a year, and at once resumed his propaganda and organizing activity.

Opening of the Rentenbank. Nov. 15. Hjalmar Schacht, appointed special currency commissioner, undertook the difficult task of substituting a new monetary unit for the worthless paper cur-The new Rentenmark, theoretically secured by a blanket mortgage on all land and industry to the amount of 3,200,000,000 gold marks, was exchangeable for one trillion of the old marks. Hans Luther, as minister of finance, tried by drastic economies, including the dismissal of more than 700,000 government employees, to balance the budget. But the Dawes Plan and the foreign loan that went with it were what really made it possible for Germany to emerge from bankruptcy. In the process most of the internal debt, public and private, was wiped out. Most of the capital of the rentier class and the savings of all classes, vanished. But many fortunes were made by clever speculators, some of them Jewish, who incurred general hatred. The drastic deflation, like the signature of the Versailles Treaty, discredited the Liberal groups, who were gradually deserted by the impoverished middle classes. The aristocracy remained monarchist at heart, while the workers tended to become more radical. The business men, who tended to dominate the various coalition governments, were, however, convinced that Germany, in need of raw materials, markets, and new capital, must remain on good terms with England, the United States, and Hence the policy of possibly France. fulfillment represented by Gustav Stresemann, who remained in every cabinet until his death in 1929. The policy made possible the flotation of large bond issues, largely in the United States, which helped pay reparations and brought on a fictitious prosperity.

Nov. 23. Fall of the Stresemann ministry. It was succeeded by a government under Wilhelm Marx (Center), in which Stresemann became minister for foreign affairs.

1924, Jan. 31. Collapse of the separatist movement in the Rhineland, after the assassination (Jan. 9) of Heinz, the president of the autonomous Palatinate government.

Apr. 9. The Dawes Plan (p. 959). It was accepted by the German Reichstag Aug. 28.

May 4. Reichstag elections. Gain of Nationalists and Communists at the expense of the moderate parties. Nov. 18. Completion of the evacuation of the Ruhr.

Dec. 7. Reichstag elections, in which the Socialists regained some of their losses.

1925, Jan. 15. Cabinet formed by Hans Luther. A Nationalist for the first time was included.

Feb. 28. Death of President Ebert.

Mar. 29. Presidential election. None of the seven candidates received the needed majority, but the Nationalist candidate, Karl Jarrès, was in the lead, with 10,416,655 votes against 7,802,496 for Otto Braun (Socialist). The constitution provided for a second election, in which the candidate receiving the largest number of votes should be elected. The Socialists and Democrats supported Wilhelm Marx, leader of the Center, while the Right parties abandoned Jarrès in favor of Field Marshal Paul von Hindenburg, in retirement since 1919. The Communists put forward Ernst Thälmann.

Apr. 26. HINDENBURG ELECTED PRESIDENT, with 14,655,766 votes against Marx's 13,751,615. Thälmann polled almost 2,000,000 votes, which, if they had gone to Marx, would have been sufficient to defeat Hindenburg.

Nov. 27

Nov. 29. The Prussian government settled the Hohenzollern claims, leaving the former emperor large tracts of land and many estates, in addition to a money payment of some $7,000,000.

Dec. 5. Resignation of the Luther cabinet. This caused a deadlock which was broken only by Hindenburg's threat to invoke Art. 48. Luther ultimately reformed his cabinet.

1926, Feb. 10. Germany applied for admission to the League, in accord with the Locarno Treaties. Her admission was postponed because of a dispute regarding seats on the council (p. 960).

Apr. 24. Treaty of friendship and neutrality with Russia, extending the Rapallo Treaty of 1922.

May 6. The Reichstag rejected a proposal to confiscate the property of former ruling families.

May 12. Resignation of the Luther cabinet, following its instructions that the old imperial colors should be used in the diplomatic service.

May 17. Second cabinet of Wilhelm Marx.

June 30. Referendum on the confiscation of royal property. The vote was heavily in favor of confiscation, but the total fell short of the number required by law.

Sept. 8. Germany admitted to the League, with a permanent seat on the council.

1927, Sept. 18. President von Hindenburg, in a memorial speech dedicating the Tannenburg monument, repudiated German responsibility for the war (Art. 231 of the Versailles Treaty).

1928, Jan. 29. Treaties with Lithuania, regarding the frontiers and the status of Memel, and providing for arbitration.

May 20. Reichstag elections. The Socialists so strengthened their number of seats that they had to be included in the government. The Nationalists lost heavily.

June 13. Resignation of the Marx ministry. Hermann Müller (Socialist) formed a new government.

Sept.-1930, June. Evacuation of the Rhineland.

Oct. 3. Death of Gustav Stresemann.

Dec. 22. A referendum upheld the decision to adopt the Young Plan.

cision to adopt the Young Plan. This marked a defeat for the Nationalists, led by Hugenberg.

1930, Mar. 27. Resignation of the Müller cabinet. A new coalition was formed by Heinrich Brüning (Center), in which parties of the Right replaced the Socialists.

July 16. The Reichstag having rejected a budget bill, President Hindenburg authorized it by decree. This act was condemned by the Reichstag, which was thereupon dissolved, the budget being put into effect by decree.

Sept. 14. Reichstag elections. Emergence of Hittler's National Socialists as a major party (107 seats as against their previous 12). The Communists returned 77 candidates. The Socialists retained 143 seats, but all the moderate parties lost heavily. This was probably a reflection of the world economic situation and the cessation of loans by the United States. The German obligations under the Young Plan were heavy and caused much Nationalist feeling. Hitler's program was opposed to all provisions of the Versailles Treaty, and especially to reparations. The election ushered in a period of disorder, with numerous clashes between National Socialist (Nazi) and Communist bands.

1931, Mar. 21. Publication of a project for a German-Austrian customs union. This met at once with vigorous protest from the French government and its satellites, the protest resting on the claim that a customs union involved infringement of Austrian sovereignty, and was therefore contrary to earlier obligations assumed by the Austrian government. The matter was ultimately referred to the World Court, which handed down a decision against the project.

May 11. The failure of the Austrian Credit-Anstalt marked the beginning of the financial collapse of central Europe, including Germany. With the financial collapse came a great economic crisis and depression. By the beginning of 1932 the number of unemployed was already more than 6,000,000. Economic hardship brought greater social tension: rapid growth of communism and of its opponent, national socialism.

Hindenburg secured 18,651,497
votes as against 11,300,000 for Hitler and 4,983,341 for Thälmann (Communist).

Hindenburg fell just short of the required majority. In the second election (April 10)
he secured a plurality of only 6,000,000 out of a total vote of 36,000,000.

May 30. Brüning, who had been obliged to govern largely by emergency decrees issued by the president, resigned when the president refused to sanction a decree which would have divided bankrupt East Prussian estates into allotments for small farmers. Hindenburg, himself of the Junker class, seems to have felt that the Brüning régime was no longer popular with the public or with the army.

May 31. Franz von Papen was asked by the president to form a ministry responsible to the executive alone. This ministry of barons included Constantin von Neurath (foreign minister) and Gen. Kurt von Schleicher (minister of defense). Brüning had refused the foreign office. National Socialists were excluded.

June 16. The government lifted a ban on Nazi Storm Troops, which had been imposed by Brüning (Apr. 13). The National Socialist movement now gained great momentum. Disorders and clashes of rival groups became the order of the day.

July 20. Coup d'état in Prussia. Von Papen removed the Socialist prime minister and other officials. Berlin and Brandenburg were put under martial law, because the activities of the Nazi Storm once resumed his propaganda and organizing activity.

May 20. Reichstag elections. The Socialists so strengthened their number of seats that they had to be included in the government. The Nationalists lost heavily.

June 13. Resignation of the Marx ministry. Hermann Müller (Socialist) formed a new government.

Sept.-1930, June. Evacuation of the Rhineland.

Oct. 3. Death of Gustav Stresemann.

Dec. 22. A referendum upheld the decision to adopt the Young Plan. This marked a defeat for the Nationalists, led by Hugenberg.

1930, Mar. 27. Resignation of the Müller cabinet. A new coalition was formed by Heinrich Brüning (Center), in which parties of the Right replaced the Socialists.

July 16. The Reichstag having rejected a budget bill, President Hindenburg authorized it by decree. This act was condemned by the Reichstag, which was thereupon dissolved, the budget being put into effect by decree.

Sept. 14. Reichstag elections. Emergence of Hitler's National Socialists as a major party (107 seats as against their previous 12). The Communists returned 77 candidates. The Socialists retained 143 seats, but all the moderate parties lost heavily. This was probably a reflection of the world economic situation and the cessation of loans by the United States. The German obligations under the Young Plan were heavy and caused much Nationalist feeling. Hitler's program was opposed to all provisions of the Versailles Treaty, and especially to reparations. The election ushered in a period of disorder, with numerous clashes between National Socialist (Nazi) and Communist bands.

1931, Mar. 21. Publication of a project for a German-Austrian customs union. This met at once with vigorous protest from the French government and its satellites, the protest resting on the claim that a customs union involved infringement of Austrian sovereignty, and was therefore contrary to earlier obligations assumed by the Austrian government. The matter was ultimately referred to the World Court, which handed down a decision against the project.

May 11. The failure of the Austrian Credit-Anstalt marked the beginning of the financial collapse of central Europe, including Germany. With the financial collapse came a great economic crisis and depression. By the beginning of 1932 the number of unemployed was already more than 6,000,000. Economic hardship brought greater social tension: rapid growth of communism and of its opponent, national socialism.

1932, Mar. 13. Presidential election.

Hindenburg secured 18,651,497
votes as against 11,300,000 for Hitler and 4,983,341 for Thälmann (Communist).

Hindenburg fell just short of the required
majority. In the second election (April 10)
he secured a plurality of only 6,000,000 out
of a total vote of 36,000,000.

May 30. Brüning, who had been obliged to govern largely by emergency decrees issued by the president, resigned when the president refused to sanction a decree which would have divided bankrupt East Prussian estates into allotments for small farmers. Hindenburg, himself of the Junker class, seems to have felt that the Brüning régime was no longer popular with the public or with the army.

May 31. Franz von Papen was asked by the president to form a ministry responsible to the executive alone. This ministry of barons included Constantin von Neurath (foreign minister) and Gen. Kurt von Schleicher (minister of defense). Brüning had refused the foreign office. National Socialists were excluded.

June 16. The government lifted a ban on Nazi Storm Troops, which had been imposed by Brüning (Apr. 13). The National Socialist movement now gained great momentum. Disorders and clashes of rival groups became the order of the

July 20. Coup d'état in Prussia. Von Papen removed the Socialist prime minister and other officials. Berlin and Brandenburg were put under martial law, because the activities of the Nazi Storm Troops had made it difficult for civil authorities to maintain order.

July 31. Reichstag elections, following a dissolution (June 4). The National Socialists returned 230 candidates; Socialists 133; Center 97; Communists 89. Since neither the Nazis nor the Communists would enter a coalition, no majority was possible.

Aug. 13. Hitler refused Hindenburg's request that he serve as vice-chancellor under Von Papen. He demanded "all or nothing."

Sept. 12. The Reichstag dissolved.

After a presidential decree had been read, a vote was taken, contrary to rules, on a Communist motion of "no confidence." This was passed by 512 votes to 42, indicating the impossibility of securing popular support for the Papen ministry.

Nov. 6. An election failed to break the Reichstag deadlock. The National Socialists lost some seats, while the Communists gained.

Nov. 17. Resignation of Von Papen.

Nov. 24. Hitler rejected the profier of the chancellorship on certain conditions. His demand for full powers was refused by Hindenburg.

Dec. 2. Gen. Kurt von Schleicher formed a new presidential cabinet.

1933, Jan. 28. Schleicher forced to resign after his efforts to conciliate the Center and Left had failed and Hindenburg had rejected a demand for another dissolution.

ADOLF HITLER, CHAN-Jan. 30. CELLOR. Von Papen, vicechancellor; Col. Hermann Goering (Nazi). aviation; Wilhelm Frick (Nazi), interior; Gen. Werner von Blomberg, defense; Constantin von Neurath, foreign affairs. Two Nationalists, Von Hugenberg and Seldte, were included. The ministry, regarded as a coalition of National Socialists and Nationalists, with important posts assigned to non-party men of the old governing class, lacked a majority so long as the Center stood aloof. But Hitler refused to compromise with Mgr. Kass, the Centrist leader, and the Reichstag was dissolved. The new elections were set for Mar. 5.

The National Socialist German Workers' Party appealed to prejudices widely held in Germany against Jews, intellectuals, pacifists, communists, socialists, and liberals. Hitler exacted unquestioning obedience from his followers, but promised in return to make Germany strong, self-sufficient, respected—an Aryan nation purified of Jewish elements, able to revive the traditions of early Teutonic heroism. His denunciations of the Versailles Treaty had brought him much support. The middle classes, ruined by inflation and by the economic depression, were offered the elimination of Jewish competition in business and the professions. Thousands of unemployed and hopeless young men were put into uniform as Storm Troops, with the support of which the lieutenants of Hitler. like Goebbels, were able to organize an unusually effective propaganda and imposing demonstrations. To what extent the movement was financed by well-to-do classes and big business interests cannot be definitely ascertained, but by many such people the movement was regarded as the last bulwark against communism. On the other hand, many radical workingmen believed Hitler's rather vague denunciations of "interest slavery" and of the evils of bourgeois capitalism in general. Hitler's fanatical patriotism and extreme nationalism, combined with asceticism, and his extraordinary powers as a popular orator, secured him the backing of many who were moved by a dark discontent with things as they were. At this stage the movement was still pretty much all things to all men.

Feb. 27. A violent election campaign culminated in a fire which partly destroyed the Reichstag building. Hitler denounced this as a Communist plot and President von Hindenburg issued emergency decrees suspending the constitutional guaranties of free speech and free press, as well as other liberties. The Nazi Storm Troops were able to intimidate and bully their opponents with impunity.

Mar. 5. The Reichstag elections gave the Nazis only 44% of the votes, and their Nationalist allies (party of big business and of the old aristocracy) only 8%. The Center Party elected 74, the Socialists 120, the Communists 81, and other non-Nazi parties 23 members. There were 288 Nazis and 52 Nationalists. The vote cast exceeded all preceding Mar. 23. Passage of the Enabling Act by the Reichstag and Reichstas. The National Socialists and the Nationalists found support among deputies of the Catholic Center. The Communist Party had already been outlawed after the Reichstag fire. Only 94 votes (all Social Democratic) were cast against the crucial Enabling Bill, which gave the government dictatorial powers until Apr. 1, 1937. Thereby the Nazi dictatorship was firmly established.

The Nazi Revolution proved to be one of the greatest overturns in German and in fact in European history. It affected almost every phase of life. The policies and achievements of the first years may be briefly summarized as follows:

- (1) CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES. The German states were allowed to continue, but the state governments were gradually shorn of all effective power. Statthalter were appointed for all the states (Apr. 7, 1933), and the Reichsrat, representing the states, was abolished (Jan. 30, 1934). Thereby the sovereignty of the states came to an end and Germany became a national rather than a federal state. Relations between the state governments and the local party organizations (Gaue) were not clearly defined, but the tendency was to identify them more and more.
- (2) ADMINISTRATIVE. By the Civil Service Law of Apr. 7, 1933, all non-Aryan (i.e. Jewish) officials of national, state, and municipal governments could be retired, as also notaries, teachers, and other semi-public servants. Thenceforth no opponent of the Nazi régime could hope to retain his position.
- (3) JUDICIAL. The entire legal system was overhauled, all traditional concepts of law being discarded and the welfare of the state and the Nazi régime became the sole deciding considerations. The People's Court (May 3, 1934) was set up to try cases of treason (which was given an extremely wide definition); the proceedings were made secret and there was no appeal except to the Führer. Summary execution of sentences became the usual thing. Decapitation was reintroduced as a form of execution. Concentration camps, in which thousands of opponents were retained without trial, became standing institutions.
- (4) POLITICAL. All opposing parties were liquidated under government pressure. Socialist parties were prohibited on May 10, 1933; the Nationalist Party dissolved itself (June 27, 1933); the Catholic parties were obliged to dissolve (July 5, 1933); all monarchist organizations were forbidden (Feb. 2, 1934). In the same way such non-political organizations as the Stahlhelm were incorporated with the Nazi party (June 21, 1933) and ultimately disbanded (Nov. 11, 1935). The National Socialist Party was declared the only political party July 14, 1933.
- (5) RACIAL. From the very outset the new régime aroused indignation throughout the world by the ruthless persecution of the Jews. A national boycott of all Jewish businesses and professions (Apr. 1, 1933)

- introduced a long series of outrages. As quickly as possible Jewish businesses were liquidated and lawyers and doctors barred from practice. By the famous Nürnberg Laws (Sept. 15, 1935) the Jews (including all those of one-quarter Jewish extraction) were deprived of rights of citizenship and all intermarriage with Jews was strictly forbidden. Many Jews left the country, though they were required to sacrifice almost all of their property in so doing. After the annexation of Austria the same measures were extended to the new state, and, June 16, 1938, the Jews were required to register all their property, at home and abroad, within a couple of weeks. Early in Nov. 1038 the persecution came to a head when, following the assassination of a German diplomat by a Jew in Paris, wellorganized attacks upon synagogues and Jewish property took place throughout the The government levied a fine of one billion marks upon the Jewish community, which amounted to a capital levy of 20% on property above 5000 marks. No secret was made of the determination of the government to drive all Jews (originally some 500,000) out of the country. In view of this desperate situation an international refugee committee was organized to arrange ways and means of effecting the emigration of so large a number as soon as possible. One great obstacle to a satisfactory arrangement was the unwillingness of the German government to allow the emigrants to take money or property with them.
- (6) RELIGIOUS. Though both Catholics and Protestants gave the Nazis considerable support at the outset, it soon became evident that the new régime was bent on co-ordinating all religious organizations with the state machinery. Neopagan movements, which were many, were countenanced and even encouraged by the government, while the Christian churches were exposed to great pressure. Protestant state churches amalgamated to form a new Evangelical Church (July 11, 1933), but when the government appointed as national bishop Ludwig Mueller, many pastors who objected to him broke away and formed the German Confessional Church, which soon found itself in conflict with the authorities. Sept. 28, 1935, the Protestant Church was placed under state control and Haus Kerrl was made minister of Church affairs with decree powers. The opposition was led by Pastor Martin Niemoeller, who was finally arrested (July 1, 1937). Though acquitted after trial (Mar. 1938), he was at once rearrested by the secret police and returned to a concentration camp. How many other recalcitrant pastors suffered the same fate can only be guessed at. The Catholic Church had an equally hard time. July 20, 1933, the government signed a new concordat with the Vatican, replacing the older agreements with separate German states. The Catholic clergy was forbidden to take part in politics and future diocesan appointments were to be made by the Holy See only after consultation with the German government. On the other hand Catholic schools and societies were to be permitted so long as they did not meddle in public affairs. Despite this agreement the government brought pressure to bear to prevent parents from sending children to confessional schools (Catholic or Protestant), and furthermore brought children into the Youth Movement, where doctrines wholly objectionable to many Christian parents were freely taught. The policy of the government led to many protests by Catholic leaders (notably Card. Faulhaber of Munich). But these proved futile. On the contrary, the government took the offensive (1937), brought many monks to trial on charges of immorality, etc., and in general did its utmost to discredit and break the influence of the Catholic Church.

(7) ECONOMIC. The workers' parties. after dissolution, were replaced by the Nazi Labor Front, which was given a new constitution (Oct. 24, 1934). Strikes and lockouts had already been forbidden (May 17, 1933), and under the new constitution the employers (as leaders in their respective factories and industries) were given extensive control. On the other hand the new régime succeeded, within a remarkably short time, in eliminating all unemployment (chiefly through opening of labor camps for young men and even women, by public works and rearmament, etc.). Many of the workers were won over to the Nazi party by the establishment of the organization Kraft durch Freude (Strength through Joy) which provided for cheap entertainment, vacations, etc. In the larger sphere the government brought to an end the reparations problem and embarked upon a policy of self-sufficiency (autarchy) which would make the country independent (especially in raw materials) in the event of war. This underlay the famous Four-Year Plan of Oct. 19, 1936. Germany suffered greatly from the parlous condition of world trade, and considerably also from the boycott of German goods resulting from the anti-Jewish policies. The great costs of government and rearmament were met by internal loans, more forced than voluntary. Industry was more and more brought under government control, just as the peasants were more and more attached to their land.

(8) MILITARY. The government restored universal compulsory military service Mar. 16, 1935, and from that time on made rapid progress in rearmament. By 1938 Germany not only had an impressive land army, equipped with the latest weapons, but an air fleet far superior to that of any other country. In the course of 1938 the western frontier was heavily fortified, giving the country further assurance against attack from France.

1933, May 28. The elections in the Free City of Danzig proved to be a victory for the National Socialists (led by Albert Forster), who captured 39 out of 72 seats in the Senate. June 20 the Nazis took over the government and thenceforth exerted themselves in the work of conforming with developments in Nazi Germany. The Polish government for a time served as a check, as did also the commissioner of the League of Nations. But after the German-Polish Agreement of Jan. 1934 the Polish government concerned itself more exclusively with protection of Poles in Danzig. In the elections of Apr. 7, 1935, the Danzig Nazis secured 43 seats. There soon developed a conflict with the League representative, whom the government boldly defied (July, 1936). The League, discredited by the Ethiopian débâcle, was unable to assert its authority, so that during 1937 the Nazis, by one device or another, gradually got rid of their opponents in the Senate. May 14, 1937, the Nationalist Party dissolved itself and a number of its representatives joined the Nazis. Socialist Party was prohibited Oct. 14, 1937. By 1938 the Nazis had 70 seats in the Senate, the other two going to Poles. The government then began to introduce legislation against the Jews and indeed to follow step by step the lead of Berlin. To all intents and purposes, Danzig was part of the German Reich.

Oct. 14. WITHDRAWAL OF GER-MANY FROM THE DISARMA-MENT CONFERENCE AND FROM THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. This marked the beginning of an independent policy in foreign affairs.

Nov. 12. Election of a new Reichstag. 93% of the voters approved the government's action in withdrawing from the League. 92% voted for the Nazi list of candidates. There were no opposition candidates, but opponents of the régime, despite intimidation, cast about three million invalid ballots, the only way of registering disapproval. The Reichstag itself, under the new system, lost all importance and became little more than an assembly of Nazi leaders occasionally convoked to hear addresses by the Führer.

1934, Jan. 26. Conclusion of the German treaty with Poland. This followed a period of extreme tension, and provided for non-aggression and respect for existing territorial rights for 10 years. It was the first breach in the French alliance system in eastern Europe. Poland became the first friend of the new régime in Germany.

June 14. Hitler and his chief associates paid a visit to Mussolini at Venice.
This move was evidently designed to pave the way for closer relations between the two Fascist states, but instead it proved to be only a prelude to a clash of interests in the Danube Valley.

June 30. THE GREAT BLOOD PURGE, in which, according to Hitler's own admission in the Reichstag (July 13), 74 persons, many of them leaders high in the party, were summarily executed because of an alleged plot against Hitler and the régime. In reality this dramatic move appears to have been directed against representatives of the more radical, social revolutionary wing of the party, which aimed at incorporation of the Storm Troops (i.e. party forces) in the army, and at farreaching property changes. Outstanding among the victims were Gen. von Schleicher and his wife (later said to have been shot by mistake); Ernst Roehm, one of the best organizers in the whole movement; Gregor Strasser, one of the earliest and most energetic, but also one of the most radical of the Nazis; Erich Klausener, prominent Catholic leader.

July 25. Nazi Putsch in Vienna, in the course of which Chancellor Dollfus was assassinated. The coup was the culmination of Nazi propaganda and pressure on the Austrian government (p. 1007). It would probably have succeeded or at least led to German intervention excepting for the fact that Mussolini mobilized his forces on the Brenner Pass and so frustrated any further Nazi action.

Aug. 2. Death of President von Hindenburg (aged 87), followed by Aug. 19. A plebiscite which approved Hitler's assumption of the presidency and of sole executive power (88%) of the votes affirmative). Hitler, however, preferred to retain the title Der Führer.

1935, Jan. 13. PLEBISCITE IN THE SAAR BASIN, conducted by the League of Nations and in accordance with the Treaty of Versailles. 90% of the electors voted for reunion of the territory with Germany as against union with France or continuation of League administration. The Nazis had unfolded a tremendous agitation in the Saar, but there is no reason to suppose that the vote did not accurately represent popular sentiment at the time. The return of the Saar to the Reich (Mar. 1) marked the beginning of German expansion under the Ilitler régime. With this crucial matter out of the way, the Führer was less dependent on the good will of France and England, and on Mar. 16. Hitler startled the world by denouncing the clauses of the Versailles Treaty providing for German disarmament. Under French lead, England and Italy joined in a strong protest against the German action (Stresa Conference, Apr.) and attempted to secure from Germany some quid pro quo in the form of nonaggression pacts, or air-limitation agreements. Nothing came of the discussions excepting the conclusion of an June 18. Anglo-German naval agreement, by which Germany promised not to extend her navy beyond 35% of that of the British. By this pact Hitler did much to reassure the British and to drive a wedge into the Anglo-French Entente.

1936, Mar. 7. THE GERMAN GOVERN-MENT DENOUNCED THE LO-CARNO PACTS of 1925 and reoccupied the Rhineland. Acute danger of war with France blew over, since all of the powers were deeply involved in the crisis of the Ethiopian War and not even France was prepared to force the issue at that time.

July 11. German-Austrian Agreement, ending a period of great bitterness between the two German states. Hitler promised to respect the sovereignty of Austria and to abstain from interference in Austrian affairs, while Austria engaged to follow a policy that befitted a German state. The agreement seems to have been intended from the German side primarily to pave the way for the

Oct. 27. Formation of the Berlin-Rome
Axis, which resulted from a visit of the Italian foreign minister, Count Ciano (Oct. 25-27). This agreement strengthened the position of both Germany and Italy with respect to France and Great Britain, setting up a league of "have-nots" (i.e. revisionist powers) against a league of the "haves."

Nov. 14. Hitler denounced the clauses of the Versailles Treaty providing for international control of German rivers. This created hardly a ripple of protest, though it involved another breach in the treaty system.

Nov. 17. Conclusion of the German-Japanese Pact, ostensibly directed against communism, but in reality an extension of the Berlin-Rome combination and an effective counterweight to the Franco-Russian Alliance (p. 963).

Nov. 18. The German government recognized the Insurgent government of Gen. Franco in Spain. From the beginning of the civil war in Spain, the Germans had openly sided with the rebels, supplying Franco with armaments and technical experts, as well as with some troops (few in number compared to the Italian "volunteers"). In this way Hitler not only supported his Italian ally, but created further difficulties for England and France, thus securing for himself a free hand elsewhere.

1937, Sept. 25-28. Visit of Mussolini to Berlin; reaffirmation of the Berlin-Rome Axis.

Nov. 24. Walther Funk replaced Dr. Hjalmar Schacht as minister of economics, Schacht remaining president of the Reichsbank. Schacht had been regarded as the financial wizard who kept the régime going, and he had, in fact, done much to develop German trade through bartering agreements with the Balkan and Near-Eastern countries. But his methods, however clever, were not in accord with the more extreme theories of Nazi circles. In Oct. 1936 the Four-Year Plan had been introduced and Gen. Goering had been made economic dictator. Funk's advent marked a further advance of the more extreme Nazi elements.

1938, Feb. 4. Reorganization of the military and diplomatic command. Werner von Blomberg (minister of war) and Werner von Fritsch (chief of staff) were removed and replaced by Gens. Keitel and Brauschitsch. In the foreign office the place of Constantin von Neurath was taken by Joachim von Ribbentrop. In the broader sense this involved the definitive subordination of both the army and the foreign service to the Nazi Party. The men who were relieved were looked upon as moderates, while the new men were known to be exponents of a bolder, forward policy. The events of the year 1938 seemed to bear out this interpretation.

Feb. 12. Visit of Chancellor Schuschnigg of Austria to Chancellor Hitler at Berchtesgaden. Harshly taken to task for his policy of opposition to National Socialism in Austria, Schuschnigg was obliged to promise amnesty to imprisoned Nazis, greater scope for their activity, and inclusion of Nazis in the cabinet. This ushered in the Austrian and indirectly the Czechoslovakian crisis (pp. 1008, 1010).

Mar. 12-13. GERMAN INVASION AND ANNEXATION OF AUSTRIA (p. 1008). Thereby over 6,000,000 Germans were added to the Reich and the way was paved for future expansion of influence in the Danube Valley.

May 7. Visit of Hitler to Rome, a state affair of great magnificence. Politically it demonstrated that the Berlin-Rome Axis continued to function despite the Austrian affair.

May 19-20. The first Czech crisis (p. 1010). The strong stand taken by France and England led to the hurried fortification of the western frontier of Germany, carried out by half a million men working day and night.

July 1. By decree all members of the German state were made liable to short-term labor service in emergencies.

Sept. 12-29. THE GREAT CZECHO-SLOVAK CRISIS (p. 1011), as a result of which Hitler annexed to Germany over 3,000,000 Germans of the Sudeten region. Politically the German success reduced the Little Entente to ruins, broke down the French alliance system in eastern Europe, and made Germany easily the dominant power on the Continent.

1939, Jan. 20. Dismissal of Dr. Schacht, whose place as president of the Reichsbank was taken by Walther Funk. Schacht had supposedly warned that the huge armament program must be curtailed if catastrophic inflation was to be averted. Germany's adverse trade balance in 1938 was 432,000,000 marks, and by standards of bourgeois capitalism the country had been bankrupt since 1931. But the more radical elements still proceeded by dictatorial methods and desperate expedients to the most ruthless mobilization of national resources.

Mar. 15. German occupation of rump Bohemia and Moravia, and extinction of the Czechoslovak state (p. 1013). Bohemia-Moravia became a German protectorate, Slovakia remained nominally independent.

Mar. 21. German annexation of Memel.
At the same time extensive demands were made on Poland with regard to Danzig and Pomorze. The firmness of the Poles and the alarm of Britain and France, which guaranteed Poland against attack (p. 966) induced the German government to hold back.

Mar. 24. A new financial program, of inflationary character, was announced. The government was to pay its debts to industry 60% in cash and 40% in "tax certificates" of two classes: (1) not discountable, for circulation only in industry; (2) small discountable denominations. These certificates, receivable in payment of taxes, were to be issued in amounts up to 10,000,000,000 marks per year.

Apr. 28. Hitler's Reichstag speech, in reply to President Roosevelt's appeal (p. 966). He denounced the Anglo-German naval convention of 1935 and the German-Polish agreement of 1934 because of the new policy of "encirclement" supposedly followed by Britain and Poland. At the same time he renewed his demands on Poland and offered any state assurance against aggression. Specific offers of bilateral non-aggression pacts were made to the Scandinavian and Baltic states, but only Denmark, Latvia and Estonia accepted.

May 22. Conclusion of a political and military alliance with Italy, an obvious reply to the British "peace front" and British efforts to reach an agreement with Russia. With European alignments gradually reverting to the pre-war situation, Germany's position was somewhat weakened, though she was clearly dominant on the continent and more or less mistress of Central Europe.

During the summer the dispute with Poland over Danzig and Pomorze rapidly came to a head. Despite repeated warnings from England and France, the Germans reiterated their demands and their determination to secure satisfaction at any cost. At the end of June German "volunteers" began to arrive in Danzig and a "free corps" was organized. Border incidents became frequent and finally, on Aug. 20, 21. The crisis broke when the German government had succeeded in arranging a pact with Russia that marked a complete reversal of the anticommunist policy which had underlain National Socialist theory. Throughout two weeks of tension (p. 966) the Berlin government refused to negotiate directly with Poland and on

- Sept. 1. War between Germany and Poland began, without formal declaration. This brought in its train almost at once the
- Sept. 8. DECLARATION OF WAR BY ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

b. THE REPUBLIC OF AUSTRIA

German Austria, with a population almost entirely German, was the most unfortunate creation of the peace conference. Of less than 8,000,000 population, 2,000,000 lived in Vienna, a great industrial center, which was cut off from the former territories of the monarchy and shut in by the high tariff walls of the new neighbors. The economic viability of the country was in question from the very outset. Despite the principle of self-determination, Austria was forbidden to unite with Germany for political reasons. The history of the country since the peace treaty centered upon the conflict between the countryside (conservative and clerical) and the metropolis, controlled by the Socialists; upon the question of union with Germany (Anschluss); and upon the question of subsistence.

- 1918, Nov. 11. Abdication of the Emperor Charles.
 - Nov. 12. A provisional government was established.
- 1919. The larger part of the year was one of confusion, marked particularly by communist disorders aiming at the overthrow of the more moderate elements.
 - Feb. 16. Election of a constituent assembly. The Socialists secured 72 seats, the Christian Socialists (agrarian, clerical) 69, the German Nationalists 26.
 - Mar. 14. The assembly adopted a constitution and voted Austria an integral part of the German Reich.

 Dr. Karl Renner (Socialist) became the first chancellor.
 - Sept. 10. Austria signed the Treaty of St. Germain, in which union with Germany was expressly forbidden. The name of the state had to be changed from German Austria to Republic of Austria.
- 1920, June 11. The Renner cabinet resigned and was followed by a ministry of all parties under Michael Mayr.
 - Oct. 1. A new constitution created a federal state on the Swiss model with eight provinces (Vienna a separate province) and a two-chamber legislature.
 - Oct. 10. A dispute with Yugoslavia over the Klagenfurt area was decided by plebiscite in favor of Austria.
 - Dec. 9. Michael Hainisch elected first president of the republic.

1921. Acute food shortage, leading to much suffering and unrest.

Apr. 24. Plebiscite in the Tyrol, which voted for union with Germany.

May 29. Salzburg voted for union with Germany. The movement of separation was stopped by Allied threats.

June 21. New cabinet of Johann Schober, supported by Christian Socialists and German Nationalists.

July-Dec. The Burgenland dispute with Hungary (p. 955).

1922, May 31. CABINET OF IGNAZ SEIPEL (Christian Socialist).

Oct. 4. The League of Nations took over the problem of Austrian reconstruction, following the earnest appeal of the chancellor. An international loan, under guaranty of the League, was accorded and a League commissioner appointed to supervise Austrian finance.

1923, Oct. 20. In the elections the Christian Socialists won a victory over the Socialists.

1924, Nov. 17. Resignation of Seipel because of ill health. His place was taken by his follower, Rudolf Ramek.

1925, Sept. 10. The League voted to discontinue control of Austrian finance in July, 1926, the reconstruction scheme having successfully put Austria on her feet.

1926, Oct. 15. The Ramek cabinet gave way to a new Seipel ministry. During this period there was a marked recrudescence of agitation in favor of union with Germany, and a growing antagonism between the Christian Socialist government and the Socialist government of Vienna, which carried on a policy of "soaking the rich" in order to carry through elaborate socialist experiments in housing, relief, etc.

July 15. The acquittal of three Nationalists of the murder of two Socialists led to riots and a general strike in Vienna. The mob burned the beautiful palace of justice, destroying many valuable records. The disorders were put down with some bloodshed. In the succeeding years clashes between the factions became more and more frequent in various parts of the country, each organizing private armies (the Christian Socialists the Heimwehr, the Socialists the Schutzbund).

1928, Dec. 5. Wilhelm Miklas elected second president.

1929, Feb., May. Great parades of rival factions in Vienna.

Apr. 30. Ernst Streeruwitz succeeded Seipel as chancellor.

Sept. 26. Second Schober cabinet, supported by Christian Socialists and Nationalists, with a program of restoring order.

1930, Feb. 6. Treaty of friendship with Italy. Beginning of the systematic support of the fascist elements by Italy.

June 17. A law forbade the possession of arms by private organizations. This was aimed at the rival factional armies.

Sept. 30. Cabinet of Karl Vaugoin.

Nov. 9. The elections gave the Socialists 72 seats as against 66 for the Christian Socialists.

Dec. 3. Cabinet of Otto Ender (Christian Socialist), including Schober and Vaugoin.

1931, Mar. 20. The Anschluss problem culminated in a projected customs union with Germany. This led to loud protests from France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, and other states, where it was held contrary to the maintenance of treaty obligations. The matter dragged on through the summer. Sept. 3 Germany and Austria voluntarily renounced the scheme. Sept. 5 the World Court, by a vote of 8-7 (generally regarded as political) held the project contrary to the Austrian engagement of 1022.

May 11. Collapse of the Austrian Credit-Anstalt, due in part to the withdrawal of short credits by France by way of pressure to force the abandonment of the customs union with Germany. The Austrian government attempted to save the bank, but was ultimately obliged to appeal for aid abroad. France refused support excepting on the most burdensome terms, but at the last moment (June 16) the British government offered a necessary loan. On the same day the Ender cabinet resigned and June 21. Dr. Buresch (Christian Socialist) formed a new government, which was concerned primarily with the effort to save the desperate financial situation.

Sept. 13. The Fascist Heinwehr attempted a coup in Styria and proclaimed Dr. Pfrimer "dictator." The movement failed for lack of active support from the police and troops, but it was a significant warning of things to come.

Oct. 3. The national assembly passed a drastic economy program in the hope of balancing the budget and then securing a loan from the League of Nations.

Oct. 9. President Miklas was re-elected.

1932, Apr. 16. The International Chamber of Commerce met at Innsbruck with unofficial delegates from the Danubian states to consider a plan for co-operation in the Danube area. Such a scheme had been advanced by the French premier, André Tardieu, but the French plan was objection-

Tardieu, but the French plan was objectionable to many of the powers. The Innsbruck Conference failed likewise because of the opposition of Austria, Germany, and Italy to any plan advanced by France or the Little Entente.

May 20. A CABINET UNDER ENGEL-BERT DOLLFUSS (Christian-Socialist) replaced that of Dr. Buresch. Like its predecessor, the new government represented a coalition of Christian-Socialists and Agrarians.

July 15. The League of Nations finally agreed to a loan of 300,000,000 schillings, Austria engaging not to enter into political or economic union with Germany before 1952. This condition roused a storm of protest in Austria, but the agreement was ratified by the assembly Aug. 17.

1933, Mar. Growing anti-governmental agitation in Austria, following the victory of the National Socialists in Ger-To meet the situation, Dollfuss suspended government parliamentary (Mar. 4) and prohibited parades and assemblies; freedom of the press was also curtailed (Mar. 8). Nevertheless the Austrian Nazis staged a great demonstration and riot in Vienna Mar. 29, and the Styrian branch of the Heimwehr became frankly In reply the government May 4 forbade the wearing of uniforms by all Nazi agitators were political parties. harried out of the land and relations with Germany became extremely tense. June 1 Hitler instituted a charge of 1000 marks on Germans desiring to visit Austria, thereby completely ruining the Austrian tourist business.

June 14. The Austrian government expelled Herr Habicht, Hitler's "inspector for Austria." The Germans retaliated and in Austria there broke out a series of terrorist outrages.

June 19. The Nazi Party in Austria was dissolved. Agitation and terrorism continued, encouraged by a virulent Nazi radio campaign. Oct. 3 an attempt was made to assassinate Dollfuss.

1934, Feb. 11-15. DESTRUCTION OF THE AUSTRIAN SOCIALISTS. This followed a decree dissolving all political parties except Dollfuss's Fatherland Front. Raids by government forces and Heimwehr on Socialist headquarters led to an uprising and the bombardment of the Karl Marx Hof, an elaborate Socialist housing unit, where the leaders had concentrated. These leaders were either captured or forced to flee. By this drastic action Dollfuss and the Christian Socialists permanently antagonized the working classes of Vienna and deprived themselves of what might have been the most effective support against the Nazi threat.

Mar. 18. Signature of the Rome Protocols, effecting close relations between Austria, Hungary, and Italy. Dollfuss was obliged to rely more and more upon Italian support against a hostile Germany.

Apr. 1. Promulgation of a new constitution for Vienna, which deprived the capital of most of its powers of self-government.

Apr. 30. An extremely complicated constitution for Austria was accepted by the national assembly. It set up a dictatorship under Dollfuss, who (July 10) reconstructed his cabinet along more Fascist lines.

May 1. A concordat with the Vatican gave the Church in Austria wide control of education.

July 25. NAZI COUP. A band of Nazis seized the radio station in Vienna and forced the staff to broadcast Dollfuss's resignation. They then entered the chancellery and (probably unintentionally) shot and killed Dollfuss. The whole affair was badly mismanaged and the conspirators were routed by Heimwehr troops. Action by Germany in behalf of the Nazis was made impossible by the strong stand of Italy and Yugoslavia, which concentrated large forces on the frontier. Thereupon the German government disavowed all connection with the affair and recalled its ambassador to Vienna.

July 30. Dr. Kurt Schuschnigg, close collaborator of Dollfuss, formed a new cabinet committed to the same policies. Twice in the course of the autumn he visited Mussolini in Italy. Economic agreements with Italy and Hungary led to some improvement of the situation, and political agitation also died down somewhat.

1935, July 4. Repeal of the anti-Hapsburg laws and restoration of part of the imperial property. This move was symptomatic of increased sentiment for return of the Hapsburgs, advocated by Prince Stahremberg and supposedly encouraged by Mussolini. The opposition of the Little Entente and of France served, however, as an effective damper.

Apr. 1. Reintroduction of conscription, in violation of the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain. The Austrian step followed similar action by Germany (p. 1002) and was intended to give the Austrian dictatorship an armed force more reliable than the Heimwehr. May 14 Schuschnigg forced Prince Stahremberg, commander of the Heimwehr, out of the offices of vice-chancellor and leader of the Fatherland Front, thus removing his only serious rival.

July 11. German-Austrian Agreement, ending the feud between the two countries at least temporarily. Germany engaged to respect the independence of Austria and Schuschnigg promised to pursue a policy befitting a German state. The agreement was evidently inspired by Mussolini during a visit by Schuschnigg to Rome (June 1), Mussolini being anxious, on the eve of the Ethiopian campaign, to secure the good-will of Germany.

Oct. 10. Schuschnigg disbanded the Heimwehr and had the members absorbed into the Fatherland Front militia. He dropped the remaining Heimwehr members from his cabinet, and Oct. 18 had himself proclaimed Front Führer.

claimed the right to decide on the question of Hapsburg restoration. All indications were that he was veering more and more in that direction. This was highly objectionable to Hitler and to the entire Nazi party, and probably accounts for the recrudescence of Nazi demonstrations and mutual recrimination (Feb.). Schuschnigg's position was further weakened by the conclusion of the Rome-Berlin Axis (p. 964) and by Mussolini's preoccupation with the Spanish civil war.

Apr. 22. Schuschnigg visited Mussolini at Venice, where he was warned that Italy could not be counted on to give armed support against Germany. Mussolini seems further to have opposed the projected restoration of the Hapsburgs and to have objected to a suggested alliance between Austria and Czechoslovakia for His advice was that common defense. Schuschnigg make his peace with Hitler and admit Nazis to the government. Schuschnigg rejected this advice, but continued throughout the year to further negotiations with Czechoslovakia and the Little Entente. Indications were that, deserted by Italy, he was seeking and finding a measure of support from France and France's allies. This policy, on the other hand, led to much dissatisfaction in Germany and to ever more outspoken demands on the part of the Austrian Nazis and Pan-Germans.

1938, Feb. 12. Schuschnigg paid a visit to Hitler at Berchtesgaden, and under pressure was obliged to promise an amnesty to Austrian Nazis who had been imprisoned, and furthermore to agree to take certain Nazis into the cabinet. Feb. 16 Arthur Seyss-Inquart (Nazi) became minister of the interior. Full amnesty was granted and (Feb. 19) the Fatherland Front was opened to Nazis.

Feb. 24. Schuschnigg, replying to a speech of Hitler (Feb. 20) promising protection to 10,000,000 Germans outside the Reich, reaffirmed the independence of Austria and appealed for support against further demands for concessions. speech called forth a good deal of enthusiasm in Austria, but the Nazis, confident of success, assumed the offensive. serious disorders broke out at Graz and soon all Styria, as well as other places, was in a state of revolution. The government was unable to cope with the situation without offending Nazi Germany. Last-minute efforts of Schuschnigg to arrange a reconciliation with the Socialist working classes came to nothing. As a last resort, Šchuschnigg suddenly announced (Mar. 9) that a plebiscite would be held on the following Sunday on the question of Austrian independence; only Yes ballots were to be distributed (those who desired to vote No would have to supply their own ballots, of specified form). This announcement drove the Nazis to extremes and plunged the country into chaos. Hitler seized the opportunity offered him, and

Mar. 11. Germany submitted an ultimatum demanding postponement of the plebiscite and the resignation of Schuschnigg. German troops began to concentrate on the frontier. Unable to resist, Schuschnigg resigned and Seyss-Inquart became chancellor. He at once appealed to the German government to send troops to restore order.

Mar. 12. The German army began the invasion of Austria. No resistance was offered. President Miklas resigned and

Mar. 13. SEYSS-INQUART PRO-CLAIMED THE UNION WITH GERMANY. Hitler arrived in Vienna Mar. 14 and took formal possession. He had already decreed a plebiscite to be held Apr. 10. In the meanwhile the most ruthless revenge was taken on all opponents of the Nazis, many of whom committed suicide and most of whom, unable to get away, were thrown into concentration camps. Schuschnigg allowed himself to be arrested and was kept in confinement without trial. The Jews suffered assault and humiliation of all kinds.

Apr. 10. The plebiscite in Austria revealed a vote of 99.75% in favor of the union with Germany. Austria was incorporated with the Reich as a new state, and was divided into seven districts (Gaue). The union was carried through with such speed and energy on the part of the Germannian statement of the Germannian speed.

mans that no international complications ensued. England and France protested, but these powers were too deeply involved in Mediterranean and Far-Eastern problems to be able to take further action, the more so as Italy refused to join in protest. Mussolini, though his ally's success brought a powerful state to the Brenner Pass, could do nothing but accept the new situation with as good grace as possible.

9. CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The new state, with a population of about 15,000,000, inherited the most valuable part of the old Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, with most of the industrial areas. Its political life since the war was dominated by the racial problem and the consequent multiplication of political parties.

1918, Oct. 14. The Czechoslovak National Council in Paris organized a provisional government, with Thomas Garrigue Masaryk (1850–1937) as president, and Eduard Benes (b. 1884) as foreign minister.

Oct. 18. DECLARATION OF INDE-PENDENCE, by the National Council.

Oct. 30. The Slovak National Council voted for union with the Czechs.

Nov. 14. A national assembly at Prague confirmed the republic and the presidency of Masaryk.

1919, Jan. The dispute with Poland regarding the Teschen area (p. 955).

Apr. 16. The Land Reform Bill. This involved the confiscation, with compensation, of the large estates and their division among the peasants in lots of about 25 acres, with state aid.

1920, Feb. 29. Adoption of the constitution, which was closely modeled on that of France.

Apr. 18. The first regular elections.

There were numerous parties, representing racial groups and social strata. The country had to be ruled by various coalitions, representing chiefly the bourgeois, democratic elements.

Aug. 14. Treaty with Yugoslavia, the basis of the Little Entente, which was directed against Hungarian revisionism and the restoration of the Hapsburgs.

1921, Apr. 23. Treaty with Rumania, completing the Little Entente. It was renewed from time to time and in 1934 the Little Entente was given a permanent organization.

1924, Jan. 25. Treaty of alliance with France.

1925, July 6. Rupture of relations with the papacy, as a result of the celebration of the anniversary of John Hus as a national holiday and a long-standing dispute regarding the delimitation of dioceses and the appointment of bishops. The matter was settled by a compromise (Dec. 17, 1927).

1927, May 27. President Masaryk reelected. Eduard Beneš remained foreign minister in all cabinets and took an active part in the work of the League of Nations.

July 1. An administrative reform gave a greater measure of self-government to the provinces. This was designed to meet the constant complaints of the Slovaks and Ruthenians that their districts were ruled from Prague by Czechs. In both areas there was an active movement demanding autonomy.

1928, Dec. The arrest and conviction of Voitech Tuka, a Slovak deputy accused of irredentist agitation in favor of Hungary, caused great ill-feeling in Slovakia.

with France, offered the most strenuous opposition to the projected German-Austrian customs union. When this matter was finally disposed of, the Czech government, beginning to suffer severely from the economic crisis which spread over central Europe after the financial crash in Vienna in May (p. 961), lent all possible support to the French scheme for regional agreements between the Danubian states.

1932, Apr. 6-8. A conference, attended by representatives of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy, met at London to discuss the Danube problem. The French (Tardieu) plan, which would have excluded Germany and Italy from the projected regional understandings, was wrecked by the opposition of those two countries.

1933, Feb. 14-16. The powers of the Little Entente, meeting at Geneva, concluded a Pact of Organization, providing for a standing council and a permanent secretariat, as well as for co-ordination of policies and for economic collaboration. This step toward greater solidarity was provoked partly by revival of irredentist agitation in Hungary, in part by the advent of Hitler's National Socialist government in Germany. In the course of the year Nazi agitation spread rapidly among the more than three million Germans living along the frontiers of the republic. These areas, being largely industrial, were particularly hard hit by the depression, so that economic grievances were added to the earlier cultural and political ones.

Oct. 4. The Sudete National Socialist Party dissolved itself, on the eve of a government order prohibiting it. Led by Konrad Henlein, the party soon emerged again as the Sudetendeutsche Partei, Nazi in its program but officially not directed at the disruption of the state.

1934, Apr. 26. Visit of the French foreign minister, M. Barthou, to Prague. His purpose was to discuss the Danubian situation as it appeared after the conclusion of the Rome Protocols (p. 990) and generally to revivify the Franco-Czech Alliance.

May 24. President Masaryk was once again re-elected.

1935, May 16. Conclusion of a pact of mutual assistance with Russia, together with an air convention. By the terms of this agreement, Russia was obliged to come to the aid of Czechoslovakia in case of attack, provided that France did so. The agreement followed the breakdown of French efforts to engineer an eastern pact, and the conclusion of the Franco-Russian Alliance (p. 963). While giving Czechoslovakia added support in case of conflict with Germany, it also aroused much opposition in Germany and exposed the republic to German wrath.

May 19. In the general elections the government coalition secured 149 out of 300 seats in the Chamber. The Sudete Party won a sweeping victory in the German areas and, with 44 seats, became the strongest single party with the exception of the Czech Agrarians.

June 4. The government of M. Malypetr was reorganized as a coalition of Agrarians, Social Democrats (Czech),
National Socialists, Clericals, and Small Traders. Despite all efforts of the premier, the Slovak Clericals stood aloof. The Sudete Germans were not included.

Nov. 5. Dr. Milan Hodža, a Slovak and the leader of the Agrarian Party, formed a new cabinet along the lines of his predecessor's.

Dec. 13. Resignation of President Masaryk, who had reached the age of 85. He was succeeded by his close friend, the foreign minister, 1935-1938. EDUARD BENES, president.

He continued to guide the republic's foreign policy, though Feb. 29, 1936 Dr. Kamil Krofta, well-known Czech historian, became foreign minister.

1936, Mar. 9-10. Premier Hodža visited Vienna. Apr. 2 a trade treaty was concluded between Czechoslovakia and Austria. This rapprochement, pursued with ever-greater assiduity, reflected the Austrian desire for support in the face of German hostility and Italian uncertainty, as well as the hope of the Czechs, backed by France, to bring Austria, and perhaps Hungary, into association with the Little Entente to form a stronger bulwark against Germany. The Czech government had already embarked upon an extensive program of armament and had undertaken the construction of a very strong line of fortifications along the German frontier.

Sept. 10. Dr. Goebbels, the German minister of propaganda, publicly accused Czechoslovakia of harboring Soviet army planes and permitting Soviet airdromes on Czech soil. Despite Czech protests, these accusations were repeated with ever-greater frequency and there developed a campaign of denunciation and recrimination reminiscent of the Nazi campaign against Austria.

1937, Sept. 14. Death of President Masaryk.

Oct. 16. The Czech police suppressed a meeting of the Sudete German Party at Teplitz. Some violence having occurred, Henlein protested against the government's brutal methods and demanded complete autonomy for the 3,500,000 Germans in the republic. In view of the general excitement and tension, the government postponed the elections scheduled for Nov. 14. All political meetings were forbidden.

Nov. 29. The Sudete German deputies left parliament, declaring that they had been beaten by the police.

1938, Mar.-May. The first German-Czech crisis. Hitler's speech of Feb. 20 promising protection to German minorities outside the Reich presaged an active policy by the Nazis and was answered by Premier Hodžo (Mar. 4) by a firm declaration that Czechoslovakia would defend itself against But the German outside interference. annexation of Austria (Mar. 13) completely changed the position of the Czechslovak Republic, which was surrounded on three sides by the new German Empire. The German government gave Prague assurances of its desire to improve German-Czech relations (Mar. 14) and both the French and Russian governments categorically declared their intention to honor their treaty obligations. Nevertheless the situation rapidly grew worse. The German Activists (i.e. German parties which had joined the cabinet) all withdrew (Mar. 22-25), and Hodža's announcement of a forthcoming Nationality Statute made but little impression on the German elements. Apr. 24 the Sudete leader, Henlein, put forward his demands (the Karlsbad program: eight points: full equality of status for Germans and Czechs; delimitation of the German areas; full autonomy; removal of all injustices and reparation for damages suffered by the Germans since 1918; full liberty for the Germans to proclaim their Germanism and their adhesion to "the ideology of Germans"; furthermore, Henlein demanded complete revision of Czech foreign policy). These demands were rejected by the Prague government, despite strong urging by France and England that the utmost concessions be made. Henlein then paid visits to London and Berlin. On his return disorders began to break out in the German districts. This situation and rumors of German troop concentration on the frontier led the Czech government to mobilize 400,000 men. France and Britain took a strong stand and the crisis (details of which are unknown) blew over. Shortly afterward Henlein began negotiations with the Czech government with regard to the Nationality Statute, but Hitler, with feverish haste, began the fortification of the German-French frontier and ordered a huge increase in the German air forces.

The summer was filled with negotiations between the government and the Sudete leaders, but little progress was made. July 26 the government finally published a draft Nationality Statute, based on the principle of proportionality, but falling short of Henlein's Karlsbad program. At the same time it was announced that a British mediator, Lord Runciman, would come to Prague. He arrived Aug. 3 and held many conferences with Sudete leaders. In the meanwhile (Aug. 12) the German government announced huge maneuvers which involved calling 750,000 men to the colors, and Aug. 28 Hitler began a demonstrative tour of the new fortifications in the west. At the same time (Aug. 26) the British government announced the concentration of most of the fleet for early Sept. British statesmen on various occasions warned publicly that British abstention in a crisis should not be counted on. By the beginning of Sept. the situation was clearly critical; various Czech proposals for cantonal organizations, etc., were flatly rejected by Henlein after visits to Hitler. The Karlsbad program was insisted on as a minimum. The French government (Sept. 7) began to call up reservists, so that about

1,000,000 men were under arms. Sept. 7-29. HEIGHT OF THE GER-MAN-CZECH CRISIS. The Sudete leaders broke off negotiations with the government (Sept. 7) after an affray at Moravska Ostrava. Discussions were resumed (Sept. 10), but disorders, provoked by extremists, became more and more frequent. Sept. 12 Hitler, in a speech at Nürnberg, first demanded in no uncertain terms that the Sudete Germans be given the right of self-determination. This address was the signal for a widespread series of disorders and the proclamation of martial law by the government (Sept. 13). Henlein and other leaders fled across the frontier (Sept. 15). To meet this dangerous situation, Prime Minister Chamberlain, in agreement with the French government, proposed a personal conference to Hitler. CHAMBERLAIN-HITLER Sept. 15. CONFERENCE AT TESGADEN. The German chancellor baldly stated his demand for annexation of the German areas on the basis of selfdetermination, and did not conceal his readiness to risk a war to attain his end. Chamberlain returned to London, as did Runciman from Prague. Sept. 18 Premier Daladier and M. Bonnet (French foreign minister) arrived in London. Decision reached to advise and urge the Czech government to accept Hitler's terms, promising an international guaranty of the rump state. After long deliberations the Czech government (Sept. 20) suggested arbitration on the basis of the German-Czech Locarno Treaty of 1925. This proposal was at once rejected by England and France as inadequate. After further pressure and threats of desertion by France and England, the Prague government finally yielded (Sept. 21), despite the fact that Poland and Hungary had both put in additional claims for territory. The Hodza cabinet resigned (Sept. 22) and a new government was formed by Gen. Jan Sirovy, popular military leader.

Sept. 22-23. CHAMBERLAIN'S
SECOND VISIT TO HITLER
AT GODESBERG. Further demands of the German chancellor: surrender of the predominantly German territories at once, without removal or destruction of military or economic establishments; plebiscites to be held in areas with large German minority by Nov. 25, under German-Czech or international supervision. These terms were regarded by Chamberlain as quite inacceptable, and as an unwarranted extension of the original German demands.

Sept. 24-29. ACUTE INTERNATIONAL

CRISIS, the most serious since The Czech government ordered full mobilization and the great powers took precautions of every kind. Britain and France began to confer with Russia, which had urged a strong stand in behalf of Czechoslovakia from the outset. Rumania also was reported favorable. On the other hand, Italy came out more and more definitely on the German side. Daladier and Bonnet again came to London (Sept. 26) and the decision was evidently reached to support Czechoslovakia in resisting the extended German demands. Chamberlain appealed to Hitler for a conference, so that the cession of Sudete territory, already agreed on by all, might be effected by discussion, not by force. President Roosevelt also appealed to Hitler and urged a conference (Sept. 27). Finally (Sept. 28) Hitler, apparently persuaded by Mussolini (to whom both Chamberlain and Roosevelt had appealed), agreed to a conference.

Sept. 29. THE MUNICH CONFER-ENCE AND AGREEMENT. Ribbentrop, Hitler, Mussolini, Ciano, Chamberlain, and Daladier conferred during the afternoon and evening, Czechoslovakia being unrepresented. The agreement (dated Sept. 29) was actually signed just after midnight. Hitler secured about all that he had demanded: evacuation to take place between Oct. 1 and Oct. 10, under conditions arranged by an international commission, which should also determine the plebiscite areas. England and France undertook to guarantee the new frontiers of Czechoslovakia against unprovoked When the Polish and Hunaggression. garian minorities questions should have been solved, Germany and Italy would give a like guaranty. The Czech government felt impelled to acquiesce in this settlement Sept. 30.

The statesmen, returning from Munich, received warm ovations from their peoples and there could be no doubt that the will to peace was strong, not only in England and France, but also in Italy and Germany.

The crisis, however, soon led to much dispute and recrimination. Many felt that the democratic powers had not only deserted the one democratic outpost in central Europe, but that they had suffered a tremendous defeat, which might have been avoided if the strong stand taken just before the Munich conference had been maintained. Others believed that the German case in Czechoslovakia was too strong to justify war against Germany, and that Hitler, far from bluffing, was determined to march. In any event, the final outcome established German hegemony in central Europe and opened the way to domination of the entire Danubian area.

THE SETTLEMENTS:

(1) GERMAN. The occupation was carried through as scheduled at Munich, taking over all the vital Czech frontier fortresses. The predominantly German regions were determined by the Austrian census of 1910. The international commission caused Germany no trouble, and in the end there were no plebiscites. Germany acquired about 10,000 square miles of Czech territory, with about 3,500,000 inhabitants, of whom about 700,000 were Czechs. By agreement with the Czechoslovak government (Nov. 20, 1938) Germany was given rights to a highway across Moravia to Vienna, and to a canal connecting the Oder and the Danube Rivers. The truncated Czechoslovak state, without defensible frontiers, became of necessity a satellite of the Reich.

(2) POLISH. During the crisis the Polish government had renewed its long-standing claims to the Teschen region. Sept. 29 a virtual ultimatum was submitted to Prague, to which the Czech government yielded. Oct. 2 Polish forces occupied the Teschen area and Czechoslovakia lost about 400 square miles of territory with some 240,000 inhabitants (less than 100,000 Police).

Poles).

(3) HUNGARIAN. The Hungarian claims to Slovakia were to be settled by negotiation, and delegates of the two countries met Oct. 9. Agreement proved impossible and serious clashes took place on the frontier. Ultimately the matter was adjusted by joint decision of Germany and Italy. Hungary received a broad strip of southern Slovakia and Ruthenia, almost 5000 square miles, with 1,000,000 population. The Hungarian claim, supported by Poland, for a common frontier with Poland, was denied.

CZECH LOSSES THROUGH THE DISMEMBERMENT: In all the republic lost 5,000,000 inhabitants (retaining 10,000,000), distributed as follows: Germans.

2,850,000; Hungarians, 591,000; Poles, 77,000; Jews, 60,000; Ruthenians, 37,000; Czechs and Slovaks, 1,161,000. In territory Czechoslovakia lost 16,000 square miles (retaining 38,500).

Oct. 5. Resignation of President Benes, who had been the target of German attack throughout the crisis. He left the country almost at once, going ultimately to the United States. His departure was the signal for a violent campaign directed against him and Masaryk and the policies that had led to Munich.

Oct. 6. Slovakia was given the full autonomy which Slovak leaders had demanded for a long time. Mgr. Joseph Tiso became premier of Slovakia.

Oct. 8. Ruthenia was given full autonomy and was renamed Carraine. This remote region of patho-Ukraine. Europe at once assumed a crucial importance as the base for Ukrainian agitation, supposedly inspired from Berlin. The Polish government made every effort to arrange for its partition between Poland, Hungary, and Rumania, but all such plans were frustrated by German opposition.

Oct. 20. The Communist Party was outlawed in Czecho-Slovakia (so spelled after the federal reorganization). This was merely one move in the direction of the new policy planned in conformity with Germany. Persecution of Jews, etc., soon followed.

Nov. 30. EMIL HACHA, judge of the high court, was elected president.

Rudolf Beran (Agrarian), an opponent of Benes and his orientation towards the west, became prime minister.

1939, Mar. 10-16. THE ANNIHILATION OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK STATE. The crisis began when the Prague government deposed Mgr. Tiso, premier of Slovakia, for allegedly working in the direction of separation, with support of the Fascist Hlinka Guards. Tiso appealed to Hitler and during a visit to Berlin was given assurances of support. Hitler summoned President Hacha and foreign minister Chvalkovsky to Berlin and induced them to "place the fate of the Czech people . . . trustingly in the hands of the Führer. who guaranteed "an autonomous development of its national life corresponding to its peculiarities." Slovakia and Carpatho-Ukraine declared independence. Mar. 15 Bohemia and Moravia became a German protectorate, which was promptly occupied by German forces, the Czechs offering no resistance. On Mar. 16 Tiso put Slovakia also under German protection. Constantin von Neurath, former German foreign minister, became protector of Bohemia and Moravia, Hacha continuing as "head of the state." The disappearance of Czechoslovakia was momentous, inasmuch as it demonstrated Hitler's readiness to extend his claims beyond German racial areas and to base them on German needs for "living area" (Lebensraum). The small states were thrown into a panic, and Britain and France promptly adopted a policy of guarantees to prevent further German expansion (p. 966).

HUNGARY 10.

Hungary, left a country of some 8,000,ooo population by the peace settlements, was predominantly agricultural, socially still organized on a semi-feudal basis. Much of the political history after 1918 had to do with the successful efforts of the landholding classes to secure and retain control and with the agitation for revision of the peace treaties and the restoration of the monarchy. The antiquated political arrangements effectively kept the lower classes from exerting much influence.

1918, Oct. 17. The Hungarian parliament, in reply to the Emperor Charles' declaration of reorganization of the monarchy, declared complete independence from Austria, except for the personal union.

Oct. REVOLUTION IN HUN-GARY, Count Michael Károlyi, grand seigneur of extremely liberal, republican, and pacifist views, made prime minister in the hope of securing satisfactory peace terms and maintaining the unity of the monarchy.

Nov. 16. The National Council proclaimed Hungary a republic.

1919, Jan. 11. Károlyi appointed president of the republic. The government at once proceeded to the work of dividing the large estates among the peasants.

Mar. 21. Károlyi resigned in protest to the Allied decision to assign Transylvania to Rumania.

Mar. 21. Formation of a Socialist-Communist government under Alexander Garbai (president) and Béla Kun (foreign affairs). The Socialists were soon crowded out and a communist dictatorship established under Béla Kun, henchman of Lenin, who had come from Russia in Nov. 1918 but had been imprisoned for communist agitation.

Mar. 28. Hungary declared war on Czechoslovakia and proceeded to the reconquest of Slovakia.

Apr. 10. Rumanian troops began to invade Hungary to forestall reconquest of Transylvania. A provisional government was set up by Count Julius Károlyi (brother of Michael), Count Stephen Bethlen, Admiral Horthy, and Archduke Joseph at Szeged (under French occupation). Beginning of the counterrevolution.

Aug. 1. Béla Kun fled to Vienna in the face of the Rumanian advance.

Aug. 4. The Rumanians occupied Budapest (until Nov. 14).

Aug. 6. Archduke Joseph took control as state governor, but was forced by Allied protests to resign.

1920, Feb. 25. Final evacuation of the country by the Rumanians, who took with them all that was movable.

Mar. 1. Admiral Nicolas Horthy, commander in chief of the forces, appointed regent and head of the state.

Mar. 23. He proclaimed Hungary a monarchy, with the throne vacant.

June 4. SIGNATURE OF THE TREATY OF TRIANON, consecrating the immense losses of territory and population involved in the establishment of Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Yugoslavia.

1921, Mar. 27. King Charles returned to Hungary and called on Horthy to give up his powers. Owing to the threatening attitude of the neighboring states, the national assembly voted against restoration and Charles was obliged to return to Switzerland.

Apr. 14. CABINET OF COUNT STEPHEN BETHLEN, who remained in power until 1931.

Aug.-Dec. The Burgenland dispute with Austria (p. 955).

Oct. 21. Second arrival of King Charles, at Ödenburg. With an improvised force he marched on Budapest. Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia began to mobilize and a government force was obliged to turn back and capture the king, who was exiled to Madeira (d. Apr. 1, 1922).

Nov. 4. A Dethronement Act abrogated the rights of Charles.

1922, June 2. Elections, held under a system of carefully restricted suffrage and open voting, gave the government a strong majority. Bethlen proceeded on a conservative policy designed to maintain the status quo. Radical disorders were put down, Jews persecuted. Efforts of the extreme royalists and Fascists (Awakening Magyars, etc.) to overthrow the government were summarily dealt with.

Sept. 18. Hungary was admitted to the League of Nations.

1923, Dec. 20. The League of Nations adopted a scheme for economic reconstruction of Hungary, not unlike the one successfully applied in Austria. This continued until June, 1926.

1926, Jan. 4. Arrest of a number of high officials, who were convicted (Mar.) of counterfeiting French francs to finance the monarchist

Nov. 11. Re-establishment of an upper house, representing the landed aristocracy.

1927, Apr. 5. Treaty of friendship with Italy, initiating a period of close relations. This was reflected in the growing agitation for treaty-revision, which was ardently supported in England by the Rothermore press.

1928, Jan. Austrian customs officials discovered five freight cars loaded with machine-gun parts, shipped from Italy and destined for Hungary. The Little Entente powers protested to the League, which held an investigation.

1930, Nov. 20. Archduke Otto, pretender to the throne, reached his majority.

1931, Aug. 15. France granted a loan to Hungary, evidently on condition that revisionist agitation should cease. Hungary suffered severely from the general world depression.

Aug. 19. Resignation of Count Bethlen, officially because of ill health, actually because of inability to cope with the financial situation. His friend, Count Julius Karolyi, took his place, but 1932, Oct. 4. Julius Gömbös, former extreme reactionary and anti-Semite, took his place. Gömbös was not averse to a measure of agrarian and electoral reform, but was above all an ardent nationalist and revisionist. He opposed the restoration of the Hapsburgs, but sought to further realization of Hungary's territorial claims by close co-operation with Fascist Italy.

1933, Jan. Discovery of another shipment of arms from Italy to Hungary threw some light on the subterranean aspects of European politics. Once again the Little Entente countries took a strong stand.

The advent of Hitler and the National Socialists in Germany led to the rapid spread of Nazi agitation to Hungary, where there were large-scale demonstrations already in April.

June. Gömbös visited Berlin, and in July he journeyed to Rome. His great hope was that Germany and Italy could both be brought to support the Hungarian claims. It was only natural, then, that he should reject the Franco-Czech plans for a Danube Federation (Dec.).

1934, Mar. 17. SIGNATURE OF THE ROME PROTOCOLS, establishing close political and economic ties between Italy, Austria, and Hungary and forming a bloc in opposition to the Franco-phil Little Entente.

Oct. 9. Assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia. It turned out that the assassins had operated from Hungary.
Acute danger of conflict developed, but the matter was finally adjusted by the League of Nations which, in a masterpiece of diplomatic circumlocution, mildly rebuked the Hungarian government (Dec. 10).

1935, Apr. 11. In the parliamentary elections the opposition groups polled 1,041,000 votes as against 908,000 for the government, but the intricate electoral system enabled the government to retain 166 seats in the Chamber as against 25 for the Agrarians, 14 for the Christian Socialists, and 12 for the Social Democrats.

June 1. Count Bethlen and his followers joined the most important opposition group, the Agrarian Party of Tibor Eckardt. This party resented the dictatorial methods of Gömbös and suspected him of designs against the constitution. At the same time it advocated land reform in behalf of the 3.000,000 landless peasants, and electoral reform as a stage on the road toward real democracy. Only by timely reform along national lines could the threat of Nazism and Fascism be removed. Oct. 6. Death of Premier Gömbös, who was succeeded by Koloman Da-Darányi represented no change in policy, but tried to follow a somewhat more conciliatory course. As a matter of fact, Hungary's position became steadily worse through international developments. The German government showed but little interest in Hungarian revisionism and was downright hostile to all proposals of a Hapsburg restoration. The attention of Italy, too, was diverted by the Ethiopian crisis and the Mediterranean situation. The formation of the Rome-Berlin Axis (Oct. 1936) involved the sacrifice of Austria by Mussolini. In the same way the Italo-Yugoslav Agreement of Mar. 1937 was tantamount to desertion of Hungary in favor of its neighbor. Under the circumstances Darânyi during 1937 drew closer to Austria and both Austria and Hungary began to seek contact with the nations of the Little Entente. This policy of necessity estranged Germany (Hungary's most important customer) and produced vigorous opposition on the part of the Hungarian Nazis.

1937, Mar. 5. The existence of a wide-spread Nazi plot was revealed. The Nazi leader, Ferenc Szálasi, and other conspirators were arrested, but were treated rather mildly. The Nazi elements had a most effective weapon to use against the government, viz. the promise of land reform and relief for the agrarian proletariat. The government resorted to evermore strenuous methods to repress agitation, but without avail.

Oct. 11. Eckardt and his Agrarian Party joined with the Legitimists. Even the Social Democrats became friendly to the idea of Hapsburg restoration as the most effective way to block the Fascist elements.

Oct. 16. Various Fascist groups united to form the Hungarian National Socialist Party, under the leadership of Szálasi. Efforts were made to glorify the regent, Admiral Horthy, and to further his candidacy for the throne. Horthy himself discountenanced these efforts.

1938, Feb. Szálasi was again arrested, with 72 associates. He was sentenced to prison and drastic steps were taken to stamp out the Fascist-Nazi movement. But

Mar. 13. The annexation of Austria by Germany brought the powerful Reich to the Hungarian border. The idea of a bloc consisting of Austria, Hungary, and the Little Entente states was exploded and the scheme of a Hapsburg restoration likewise. The large German element in Hungary (c. 500.000) became more and more restless and the Nazi danger became ever more urgent.

May 13. A new cabinet was formed by Béla Imredy, eminent financier, who was regarded by the ruling classes as the strong man needed to manage the situation. Imredy did, indeed, rule with a strong hand. At the same time, however, he initiated certain political and economic reforms (a part of all large estates to be distributed to the peasantry, etc.) and undertook the limitation of Jewish activity in business and the professions. In this way he hoped to steal the thunder of the Nazi agitators. For the rest he tried to maintain good relations with Germany. In Aug. Admiral Horthy paid a visit to Germany, where he was received with great ceremony and splendor.

ACQUISITION OF SOUTH-Nov. 2. ERN SLOVAKIA, as a result of the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia (p. The Hungarian claims were valiantly championed by both Germany and Italy, two powers which served as arbitrators after the Czech and Hungarian governments had failed to agree. Hungary was given 5000 square miles of territory, with 1,000,000 inhabitants. This was less than the Hungarians claimed as theirs, but Germany vetoed any further reduction of Slovakia and particularly any idea of joining Hungary and Poland (as desired by Poland and also by Italy). Sporadic fighting continued along the new frontier throughout the winter of 1938-1939.

1939, Jan. 20-23. The Italian foreign minister, Ciano, on a visit to Belgrade, devoted himself to the adjustment of Hungarian-Yugoslav relations, with what success was not clear. Yugoslavia's unwillingness to consider any cessions of territory to Hungary made any reconciliation difficult.

Feb. 15. Resignation of Premier Imredy.

The Nazis, whom he had tried to outdo in his anti-Semitic policy, had taunted him with his own Jewish ancestry. He was finally obliged to admit that he had one Jewish great-grandfather and this admission, he felt, made his retention of the premiership impossible.

Feb. 24. The new government of Count
Paul Teleki suddenly suppressed the leading Fascist organization, yet at the same time, to placate Germany, joined the anti-communist pact of Germany, Japan, and Italy.

Mar. 15. HUNGARY OCCUPIED CAR-PATHO-UKRAINE and annexed it after heavy fighting with the inhabitants, who had driven out the Czechs and, under Augustin Volosin, had enjoyed independence for one day. Thus Hungary was able to exploit the German absorption of Bohemia and Moravia (p. 1013), securing at last a common frontier with Poland. A small slice of eastern Slovakia was also conquered, with German consent, but the remainder was guaranteed by Germany as to independence and integrity.

Apr. 11. Hungary withdrew from the League of Nations, revealing further influence of German pressure.

May 3. Introduction of drastic anti-Jewish laws providing for rigorous limitation of Jews in professions and business, expulsion from government service and eventual emigration within five years.

May 28. In the elections the government secured 180 seats out of 260, but the Nazis increased their representation from 6 to 53, while the Agrarian had 14 seats as against a previous 23.

11. THE BALKAN STATES

a. YUGOSLAVIA

The history of the new state, composed of Serbia, Montenegro, Croatia, Slovenia, and Dalmatia, was marked chiefly by the efforts of the Serbs to establish a centralized Serb state and by the vigorous resistance of the Croats and Slovenes (Roman Catholic and much more westernized than Serbia) to secure some type of autonomy.

1917, July 20. THE PACT OF CORFU, signed by Serbian, Croatian, Slovenian, and Montenegrin representatives, declared that the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes formed a single nation, to be organized under the Serbian dynasty.

1918, Apr. 8-10. Congress of Oppressed Nationalities (chiefly under Hapsburg rule) at Rome. Italy recognized the unity and independence of the Yugoslav nation.

Oct. 19. The National Council at Zagreb proclaimed itself the authoritative body for the Yugoslavs and declared for union.

Nov. 26. A national assembly in Montenegro proclaimed union with Serbia and declared King Nicholas, who had resisted previous efforts at union, deposed (d. Mar. 1, 1921, in exile).

Dec. 1. Prince Alexander of Serbia accepted the regency of the new state.

Dec. 4. THE KINGDOM OF THE SERBS, CROATS AND SLO-VENES FORMALLY PRO-CLAIMED.

1919, Feb. Dispute with Italy regarding the allocation of Fiume and territory on the Dalmatian coast (p. 955).

June 13. The Peace Conference decided that the Banat of Temesvar, in dispute between Yugoslavia and Rumania, should be divided between them.

1920, Aug. 14. TREATY OF ALLIANCE
WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA (renewed Aug. 31, 1922, and later), laying the foundation for the Little Entente (p. 957).

Oct. 10. Plebiscite in the Klagenfurt area, in dispute between Yugoslavia and Austria (p. 1005).

Nov. 12. Treaty of Rapallo with Italy, settling the Fiume question.

Nov. 28. Elections for a constituent assembly. No party had a majority, but the Croats (leader Stephen Radich) refused to take their seats, demanding recognition of the federal principle. This left the field free for the Serbian Centralists (leader Nicholas Pasich).

1921, Jan. 1. The new constitution provided for a centralized form of government. Pasich became premier of a coalition of Serbian Radicals and Democrats. The Croats continued in opposition.

June 27. TREATY WITH RUMANIA, second link in the Little Entente.

Aug. 16. Death of King Peter.

1921-1934. ALEXANDER I. He was a hardworking, intelligent ruler, whose aim, however, was to consolidate the kingdom despite opposition from Croats and other groups.

1923, Mar. 18. The elections failed to effect any substantial change. The Croats remained in opposition and boycotted the parliament.

1924, June 27. Treaty of friendship with Italy for five years, following settlement of the Fiume problem. This was not renewed in 1929.

July 18. The Pasich government resigned after Radich had changed his tactics and had upset the parliamentary balance by instructing his followers to take their seats. The Pasich ministry was reconstructed, but efforts to effect a compromise with Radich failed.

Dec. 24. The Croat Peasant Party was outlawed and Radich imprisoned.

1925, July 18. Radich having at last recognized the constitution, he was liberated and some of his followers were given seats in the cabinet. Radich himself became minister of education (Nov. 18).

1926, Apr. 1. Resignation of Radich and other Croatians from the cabinet.
 Aug. 17. Treaty with Greece, settling the question of the Yugoslav free zone at Saloniki (p. 1020).

Sept. 15. Treaty of friendship with Po-

Dec. 10. Death of Pasich, veteran leader of the Radical Party.

1927, June. Rupture of relations with Albania, following repeated frontier incidents (p. 1020).

Nov. 11. Treaty of friendship with France, intended as a reply to the Italian advance in the Balkans.

1928, June 20. Radich and his associates were fired upon in parliament by a Radical deputy. Radich died Aug. 8. The Croat deputies once again withdrew from parliament.

Aug. 1. The Croats once more demanded the institution of a federal régime as the price of their co-operation. They then set up a separatist "parliament" at Zagreb and refused to have anything more to do with the Belgrade government (Oct.). All efforts of the king to effect a compromise ended in failure.

1929, Jan. 5. KING ALEXANDER PRO-CLAIMED A DICTATORSHIP.

Gen. Zhivkovich premier; the constitution was suspended and parliament dissolved; a rigorous censorship was introduced and local government curtailed. Alexander then set to work to end corruption and purge the administration and army.

Jan. 21. The Croat and all other parties were dissolved.

Feb. 17. A legislative council, with only advisory powers, was set up to replace parliament.

Mar. 27. Treaty of friendship with Greece.

May 22. Arrest of Dr. Vladko Machek, the new leader of the Croats.

June. Beginning of border raids by Macedonian revolutionaries from Bulgaria. Acute tension in Yugoslav-Bulgarian relations; the frontier hermetically closed. This situation continued throughout the following years.

Oct. 3. The name of the kingdom was officially changed to Yugoslavia, another indication of the king's effort to wipe out the old historic divisions. The traditional provinces were divided into nine new banats, with purely geographical names.

1930, June 14. Machek was acquitted.

1931, Sept. 3. The king announced the end of the dictatorship and introduced a new constitution (two-chamber parliament). The electoral law left no place for purely local parties; two-thirds of the seats were to go to the party receiving the largest number of votes; voting to be open.

Nov. 9. Farcical elections. The government named most of the candidates and therefore won a great victory; most of the opposition groups had abstained.

1932, Nov. 14. The Croat Peasant Party denounced the régime of personal rule and again demanded autonomy, following the imprisonment of the Croat leader, Dr. Machek (Oct. 17).

1933, Jan. Slovene and Croat leaders were arrested.

Feb. 15. Reorganization of the Little Entente, the treaties becoming indefinite in duration and a permanent secretariat being set up (p. 963).

Apr. 29. Machek, Croat leader, was imprisoned for three years for treasonable activity.

Oct.-Nov. Alexander visited Sofia and Istanbul as part of a series of visits exchanged by Balkan rulers in the effort to bring about a Balkan Pact (fear of Nazi Germany).

Dec. 10-13. King Boris of Bulgaria visited Belgrade: initiation of the Bulgarian-Yugoslav reconciliation.

1934, Feb. 8. CONCLUSION OF THE BALKAN PACT between Yugoslavia, Greece, Rumania, and Bulgaria refused recognize the territorial settlement and therefore could not join.

Conclusion of a trade agreement with Germany; fears that Yugoslavia might veer to the German side, especially in view of the Italian-Austrian-Hungarian rapprochement.

June 25. Visit of M. Barthou, the French foreign minister, to Belgrade; he evidently persuaded the government to stick by the French connection.

Sept. 23. Visit of Alexander to Sofia, apparently in the hope of bringing Bulgaria into the Balkan Pact.

ASSASSINATION OF KING ALEXANDER and M. Barthou at Marseilles. The assassin was a Macedonian revolutionary, working with Croat revolutionists having headquarters in Hungary. The assassination led to acute danger of war between Yugoslavia and Hungary (deportations on both sides), which was finally adjusted (Dec. 10) through the good offices of the League of Nations.

1934-PETER II (b. 1923). Prince Paul (cousin of Alexander) chief regent.

Nov. 15. The Croats offered to cooperate with the government, hoping for concessions from the conciliatory regent.

Machek pardoned, but the government made no move in the direction of concessions.

1935, May 5. In the elections government pressure was exerted to the full, but the coalition of the Croats and a new party of Serbian peasants polled two-fifths of the votes.

June 3. The Croats resumed boycott of parliament.

June 20. A new cabinet, under M. Stoyadinovich, announced the coming liquidation of the dictatorial régime and a new electoral law. Relaxation of repressive measures and methods, but only for a time.

Stoyadinovich formed a new Aug. 19. Radical Union of Serbian Radicals, Slovene Clericals, and Bosnian Moslems, which reaffirmed the principle of unity and blasted hopes of a federal solution.

1936, May. Conclusion of a barter agreement with Germany. This was made necessary by the falling-off of trade with Italy subsequent to Yugoslavia's imposition of sanctions during the Ethiopian crisis. Ever closer trade relations with Germany brought in their train a political rapprochement which appears to have been decidedly unpopular in the country.

1937, Jan. 24. Signature of the BUL-GARIAN-YUGOSLAV TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP AND PERPETUAL PEACE, bringing to an end the long antagonism between the two states. This was followed by an even more astounding departure in foreign affairs, the Mar. 25. CONCLUSION OF A NON-AGGRESSION AND ARBITRA-TION PACT WITH ITALY for five years. Both parties guaranteed each other's frontiers; the Yugoslav minority in Italy was to be given language and school concessions; economic collaboration was envisaged. This new agreement associated Yugoslavia more closely than ever with the Berlin-Rome Axis, and was therefore warmly denounced by the opposition groups in Yugoslavia itself. The government, in the hope of frustrating the opposition by winning over the Croat clerical elements, brought before the Chamber for ratification July 23. A Concordat with the Vatican. granting Roman Catholics wider privileges. The concordat was signed, but Orthodox groups created so much disorder that the government was obliged to drop the project. The total effect was to estrange the Orthodox Church without really winning any support from the Croats.

Oct. 6. The opposition groups closed ranks and formed the Agrarian-Democratic Party, composed of Croats and Serbian democrats. The program called for abolition of the dictatorship and restoration of democratic government. The increasing strength of the opposition obliged Stoyadinovich to renew his efforts to satisfy the Croats, but prolonged negotiations during 1938 led to nothing.

1938, Dec. 11. In the parliamentary elections Stoyadinovich managed to secure victory for his party (by corruption, so it was claimed by the opposition), but in Croatia the Peasant Party of Vladko Machek received an overwhelming vote. As a result 1939, Feb. 4. Stoyadinovich was obliged to resign. The new cabinet of Dragesha Cvetkovich rested upon the same coalition (Radical Union) as had Stoyadinovich, but it was committed to making larger efforts to conciliate the Croats.

Apr. 27. Substantial agreement was reported reached with Machek, envisaging the reorganization of Yugoslavia as a federal state. In the meanwhile Yugoslavia was courted by both alliance groups in Europe. Count Ciano visited Belgrade and Prince Paul (June 1) visited Berlin, where Hitler in a toast once more assured him of the inviolability of the Yugoslav frontier.

The settlement of the Croat problem hung fire throughout most of the summer until the German-Polish crisis (p. 966) finally precipitated a decision.

Aug. 26. DEMOCRATIC GOVERN-MENT WAS REESTABLISHED in Yugoslavia and new elections by secret ballot were arranged for. The state was to be reorganized on a federal basis, the Croats receiving complete autonomy in all cultural and economic matters. Machek became vice-premier and five other Croats joined the cabinet.

b. ALBANIA

1912, Nov. 28. Proclamation of independence by a national assembly at Valona; provisional government under Ismail Kemal.

1913, May 30. The Treaty of London (p. 760) recognized the independence of Albania and set up a commission to determine the boundaries.

1914, Jan. 15. The government of Ismail Kemal gave way to one under Essad Pasha. Feb. 21. Prince William of Wied, a German officer and close relative of Queen Elizabeth of Rumania, was offered the crown by Essad and accepted.

Mar. 2. Northern Epirus (southern Albania) proclaimed independent by Greeks led by Zographos. This matter was adjusted by the powers and the area was given autonomy.

Mar. 7. Arrival of Prince William.

From the outset friction developed between him and Essad, the real ruler of the country.

Sept. 4. William left the country, after the outbreak of the World War.

Sept. 13. The Italians landed at Valona.

During the war the Italians gradually occupied most of southern Albania and the Serbs and Montenegrins the northern part. Both were driven out by the Austrians. The government of Essad fled to Italy (Feb. 24, 1916).

1918, Dec. 25. A national assembly elected Turkhan Pasha president. The government had to deal with the incursions of the Yugoslavs in the north and the Italians on the coast. The latter were finally driven out in 1020.

1920, Aug. 2. Italy agreed to evacuate Valona, while retaining the island of Saseno. The Italians left Sept. 2.

Dec. 17. Albania was admitted to the League of Nations.

1921, June. Erection of the Mirdite Republic at Prizrend, under Yugoslav auspices.

Nov. 9. The conference of ambassadors decided on the frontiers of 1913 for Albania, with some slight concessions to Yugoslavia.

1922, Dec. 3. Ahmed Bey Zogu became premier, representing the Yugoslav party.

1924, June 10. A revolution, led by Bishop Fan Noli and supported by Italy, led to the flight of Ahmed Zogu.

Dec. 12. A counter-revolution, organized in Yugoslavia, overthrew Fan Noli, who fled to Italy (Dec. 27).

1925, Jan. 6. Ahmed Zogu became premier again.

Jan. 21. THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY PROCLAIMED ALBANIA A RE-PUBLIC, with Ahmed Zogu as first president.

Mar. 2. A constitution was promulgated, providing for parliamentary government, but granting the president almost dictatorial powers.

Sept. 2. A national bank was organized, under Italian auspices and supported by an Italian loan.

1926, July 30. A final act fixing the frontiers was signed by Great Britain, France, Italy, Greece, and Yugoslavia.

Nov. 20-26. An insurrection in the north, supposedly supported by Yugoslavia, was put down with difficulty.

Nov. 27. TREATY OF TIRANA, between Italy and Albania. The two powers promised each other support in maintaining the territorial status quo, and Italy promised not to interfere in Albania except by request.

1927, May-July. A rupture of Albanian-Yugoslav relations was finally patched up by the powers.

Nov. 22. SECOND TREATY OF TI-RANA, taken as a reply to the French treaty with Yugoslavia (Nov. 11): the treaty established a defensive alliance for 20 years and provided for military cooperation. It marked the beginning of what became practically an Italian protectorate. The Italians granted Albania substantial loans (especially in 1931) and in return secured valuable concessions (notably oil), supervision of military affairs, construction of roads, educational privileges, etc.

1928, Sept. 1. Ahmed Bey Zogu was proclaimed king as 1928-1939. ZOG I. Throughout he acted as the champion of the modernization of the country (building of Tirana as a modern capital, language reform, educational development, religious independence, etc.).

Nov. 22. The assembly adopted a new monarchical constitution.

1931, June. An Italian loan, spread over ro years and subject to Italian supervision, established Italian economic control of the country.

1932. King Zog rejected a proposal for a customs union with Italy; beginning of Albanian opposition to too great extension of Italian influence. In Sept. some 200 persons were arrested and seven sentenced to death for allegedly plotting the establishment of a republic.

1933, June. Further friction with Italy, resulting from the closing of Italian schools.

1934, June 23. After further disputes an Italian fleet suddenly appeared at Durazzo and frightened the government into submission. The Italian control of the army was strengthened, Italians were given the right to colonize certain areas, etc.

1936, Mar. 19. Further agreements between Italy and Albania marked another stage in the extension of Italian control, providing as they did for even closer financial and trade relations.

1937, May 15-19. Insurrection of the Moslems in the southern sections. The immediate cause was the government's decree forbidding the veiling of women, but in the larger sense it was another expression of discontent with King Zog's dictatorial rule.

1939, Apr. 7. END OF ALBANIAN IN-DEPENDENCE. The Italians. long irritated by Albanian resistance to their direction (prohibition of a Fascist party, etc.) took advantage of the confusion produced by German absorption of They bombarded the Czechoslovakia. coast towns and landed an army which, after some resistance by the natives, over-ran the whole country. King Zog and his queen fled to Greece and then Turkey. On Apr. 12 an Albanian constituent assembly voted personal union with Italy and King Victor Emmanuel graciously accepted the crown. On June 3 Albania was given a constitution providing for a Superior Fascist Corporative Council over which the king, however, retained extensive control.

c. GREECE

1917-1920. ALEXANDER I, king.

1919, April 29. The Dodecanese, in a plebiscite, voted for union with Greece.

May 14. Landing of the Greeks at Smyrna (p. 954).

July 29. Venizelos-Tittoni Agreement: the Dodecanese to be ceded to Greece when the Treaty of Sèvres went into effect.

1920, May 14. Agreement with Italy providing for the immediate cession of the Dodecanese, except Rhodes, which was to have a plebiscite at the end of 15 years.

June 22. Beginning of the Greek offensive in Anatolia (p. 1004).

Aug. 10. THE TREATY OF SEVRES: Greece obtained Smyrna, the Dodecanese (except Rhodes), eastern Thrace, Imbros, and Tenedos.

Oct. 25. Death of King Alexander. Regency of Queen Olga.

Nov. 14. Defeat of the Venizelists in the election, due to dissatisfaction with the Anatolian adventure.

Venizelos resigned.

Dec. 5. A plebiscite, held despite Allied warnings, showed an almost unanimous vote for King Constantine. The Allies thereupon withdrew all support from Greece. 1920-1922. CONSTANTINE I, restored. He announced continuation of the war with Turkey.

1921, Aug. Battle of the Sakkaria. The Greeks failed to reach Angora (p. 1005).

1922, Aug. 18. Turkish counter-offensive.
Taking of Smyrna, Sept. 9 (p. 1005).

Sept. 21. Revolt of Gens. Gonatas and Plastiras in Chios.

Sept. 26. The Venizelists took Saloniki and demanded the abdication of the king.

Sept. 27. Abdication of Constantine (d. Jan. 11, 1923).

1922-1923. GEORGE II, who was a mere puppet in the hands of the military men.

Oct. 8. Italy denounced the agreement regarding the Dodecanese on the plea of the collapse of the Sèvres Treaty.

Nov. 13. Trial for treason of the ministers and commanders of Constantine. Gounaris and five others convicted and shot.

1923, May 10. Yugoslavia granted a small free zone at Saloniki for 50 years beginning 1025.

beginning 1925.

July 24. TREATY OF LAUSANNE

(p. 1095). Exchange of populations: In the period till 1930 some 1,250,000

Greeks repatriated, with the help of the League and of the Near-East Relief Commission; great financial and other problems connected with this great transfer, but Greece enriched by influx of artisans and farmers.

Aug. 27. Murder of the Italian officer, Gen. Tellini, and his staff, on the Albanian front. Italian bombardment and occupation of Corfu (Aug. 29). Settlement of the incident by the League of Nations in Dec. (p. 988).

Dec. 16. Great victory of the Venizelists in the elections.

Dec. 18. George II left Greece, under pressure from the military junta.

1924, Jan. 11. Venizelos premier. He opposed the deposition of the king, but, failing to convince the military men, resigned (Feb. 3) and retired from Greece.

Apr. 13. A plebiscite resulted in an overwhelming vote for a republic.

May 1. GREECE PROCLAIMED A REPUBLIC. Adm. Paul Kondouriottis made provisional president.

1925, June 25. Coup d'état of Gen. Theodore Pangalos.

Oct. 22-23. Clash of Greek and Bulgarian forces on the frontier, followed by the invasion of Bulgaria. The matter was settled by the League of Nations (Dec. 14), which fined Greece.

1926, Jan. 3. Pangalos made himself dictator, voiding the republican constitution of Sept. 30, 1925.

Mar. 19. President Kondouriottis resigned.

Apr. 11. Pangalos, president.

Aug. 22. Pangalos overthrown by Gen. George Kondylis, who recalled Kondouriottis.

Sept. 24. The new constitution promulgated.

Nov. 7. The Republicans won a bare majority in the elections. A coalition government formed by Alexander Zaimis.

1928, May 31. Return of Venizelos, who formed a cabinet (July 4).

Sept. 23. Pact of friendship with Italy, first step in Venizelos's policy of restoring Greece's international position.

1929, Mar. 17. Settlement of the free zone controversy with Yugoslavia, which was given more extensive privileges at Saloniki than in the agreement of 1023.

Mar. 27. Pact of friendship with Yugo-slavia.

May 16. Venizelos restored the Senate (abolished 1862) in the hope of adding stability to the republican régime.

Dec. 10. Retirement of President Kondouriottis. Zaimis provisional president.

1930, Oct. 5-12. First Balkan Conference at Athens, called by Venizelos in the hope of establishing better relations between the Balkan states and improving the economic situation.

Oct. 30. TREATY OF ANKARA with Turkey, following Venizelos's visit to Ankara (p. 1096).

1932, Sept. 25. The Venizelists failed to secure a majority of seats in the election. Growing power of the royalists, strengthened by general economic stringency.

Oct. 31. Venizelos resigned and was followed (Nov. 4) by a moderate royalist cabinet under Panyoti Tsaldaris, who declared his loyalty to the republic and was therefore tolerated by the Venizelists.

1933, Jan. 13. Fall of the Tsaldaris cabinet, defeated on its financial policy.

Jan. 16. Venizelos became premier again, but, after dissolving parliament, suffered

Mar. 5. Defeat in the elections. Plastiras, an ardent republican general, attempted a coup d'état, which failed.

Mar. 10. Tsaldaris premier again, despite Venizelist opposition.

Sept. 15. Ten-year non-aggression pact with Turkey. The two countries agreed to close co-operation in foreign policy.

1934, Feb. 9. CONCLUSION OF THE BALKAN PACT between Greece, Turkey, Yugoslavia, and Rumania (p. 063).

Oct. 19. Zaimis elected president for five years.

1935, Mar. 1. Rising of the Venizelists in Athens, Macedonia, and Crete, as a protest against royalism. The movement was put down, after some fighting, by Gen. George Kondylis. Venizelos fled to France.

June 9. In the elections the followers of Tsaldaris and Kondylis secured most of the seats, the republicans having abstained from voting.

Oct. 10. By a coup, Kondylis ousted Tsaldaris and induced parliament to vote for the recall of the king.

Nov. 3. A farcical plebiscite resulted in an almost unanimous call for restoration of the monarchy.

Nov. 24. Return of George II, from exile in England. The king was supported by England (Ethiopian crisis), but was at the mercy of Kondylis.

1935- GEORGE II, RESTORED. He insisted on a general amnesty (Dec. 1).

1936, Jan. 26. The elections were a victory for the Venizelists, who, however, failed to secure a majority of the seats.

Jan. 31. Sudden death of Kondylis.

Mar. 18. Death of Venizelos, in exile at Paris.

Apr. 13. Gen. John Metaxas, premier.

Aug. 4. COUP D'ÉTAT OF METAXAS, who made himself dictator, pro-who made himself dictator, proclaimed martial law and dissolved the parliament. Institution of a régime of rigid repression (parties abolished; censorship; persecution of opponents). The Metaxas régime rested squarely on the army, but real efforts were made to conciliate the population by wage increases, social security legislation, artificially low bread prices, etc., as well as by cancellation of agricultural debts. A huge public works program (esp. rearmament) necessitated a substantial increase of taxation and domination of business by government. In foreign affairs Metaxas drew closer to Germany (barter agreements), but at the same time attempted to retain the good-will of England and France. Relations with Turkey continued to be close.

1938, July 29. A revolt broke out in Crete, but was quickly suppressed. Despite widespread dissatisfaction with the dictatorship, the régime became more and more firmly entrenched, and

July 30. Metaxas became premier for life.

1939, Apr. 13. Britain and France guaranteed Greek independence and integrity following the Italian conquest of Albania and the sudden danger of aggression against Greece.

d. BULGARIA

Defeated in the First World War, Bulgaria not only failed to recover any of the territory lost in the second Balkan war, but was also deprived of some further areas on the Serbian frontier and of all access to the Aegean. The country was flooded with thousands of refugees from Thrace and Macedonia, whom the government, loaded with debt and with heavy reparations payments, was unable to settle. They formed a huge mobile element, easy converts to the revolutionary program of the Macedonian committees or to Bolshevik agitators. The drastic policy of nationalization pursued by the Yugoslav and Greek governments in Macedonia stimulated the unrest in Bulgaria which the government was unable to Raids of revolutionary bands control. across the frontiers became the order of the day, creating a state of chronic tension between Bulgaria and her neighbors.

1918, Oct. 4. Abdication of Tsar Ferdinand.
1918- BORIS III, son of Ferdinand,

1919, Aug. 17. In the elections the Peasant Party won a great victory.

Oct. 6. Alexander Stamboliski, leader of the Peasant Party, became premier. He had opposed Bulgaria's entry into the war on the side of Germany and had been imprisoned as a result. He now took revenge on his opponents. All members of the Radoslavov cabinet (except the premier, who had escaped) were tried and convicted; they were heavily fined and imprisoned. Stamboliski, moved by hatred of the bourgeoisie and intellectuals, there upon embarked on a policy of disappropriation: a drastic land law broke up all crown lands and estates of over 75 acres; a heavy income tax was levied on all but the peasants; the university was shut down; freedom of the press was abolished, and all opponents of the régime were ruthlessly dealt with. In foreign affairs Stamboliski followed a policy of fulfillment of the peace treaties and reconciliation with Yugoslavia. The Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO) was broken up.

Nov. 27. Bulgaria signed the Treaty of Neuilly (terms, p. 953).

1920, Dec. 16. Bulgaria became a member of the League of Nations.

1922, Dec. 4. Attempted rising of the Macedonians, under Todor Alexandrov. They took and held the town of Küstendil for a time.

1923, Mar. 21. Agreement with the Allies with regard to reparations.

June 9. STAMBOLISKI WAS OVER-THROWN by a conspiracy of officers, Macedonians, and others affected by his class policies.

June 10. A cabinet was formed by Alexander Zankov.

June 14. Stamboliski was shot and killed, allegedly in an effort to escape. Zankov and the new government proceeded with great vigor in a policy of revenge. The condemned members of the Radoslavov government were released.

Sept. 26-28. An abortive communist insurrection led to much blood-shed and to violent repression.

1924, Aug. 31. Assassination of Alexandrov, the Macedonian leader, by members of a rival faction. The IMRO then broke into two groups, one led by Protoguerov and the other by Ivan Mihailov. These were mutually hostile and fought each other as bitterly as they fought the enemy.

1925, Apr. 16. Bomb outrage in Sofia Cathedral. The bomb, which killed 123 persons, was set off by communists; it only served to heighten the terrorist policy of the government.

May 4. Communists were outlawed in Bulgaria.

Oct. 21. Greek invasion of Bulgaria, following serious frontier incidents. The matter was settled by the League (p. 1021).

1926, Jan. 4. A cabinet of Andrew Liapchev followed that of Zankov and attempted a more conciliatory policy. Feb. 4. All political prisoners except communists were amnestied.

June 10. Liapchev secured from the League of Nations a huge loan, to facilitate the settlement of refu-

July 28. Great raid of the Macedonians over the Yugoslav frontier.

Aug. 11. Stiff note of Yugoslavia, Greece, and Rumania demanding cessation of raids. The government was apparently helpless.

1927, June 19. Further raids on Yugoslav territory.

Oct. 10. The government proclaimed martial law along the frontier and attempted to suppress the Macedonian activity.

1928, July 7. Assassination of Protoguerov by the Mihailov faction. Open war followed between the two groups.

1929, Mar. 6. Treaty of friendship with Turkey.

Sept. 26. Agreement with Yugoslavia for the establishment of a frontier régime.

1930, Jan. 20. The Hague Agreement greatly reduced the Bulgarian reparations payments.

Aug. 11. Action by the government against the IMRO; Mihailov was arrested.

Oct. 5-12. First Balkan Conference at Athens. Bulgaria sent delegates, but from the outset made further co-operation dependent on a settlement of the minorities question.

Oct. 25. Marriage of Tsar Boris and Princess Giovanna, daughter of Victor Emmanuel III of Italy. Gradual rapprochement between Italy and Bulgarla.

1931, Jan.-Feb. Further frontier incidents with Greece led to a tense situation and mediation by the powers.

June 21. In the elections the Peasant Party won a victory over the Democratic Entente, which had supported Zankov and Liapchev. A new cabinet was formed (June 29) by Alexander Malinov, Democrat, in alliance with the peasants.

Oct. 12. Cabinet of Nicholas Mushanov, also a Democrat supported by the Peasant Party.

1932, Feb. 8. Bulgaria denounced further reparations payments.

Sept. 25. Striking success of the Communists in the Sofia municipal elections. But in the communal elections (Nov.) the Democrats and Agrarians won an overwhelming victory.

1933, June 24. The government arrested over a thousand Communists and Macedonians.

Oct. 3. King Alexander visited Sofia, first step in the reconciliation of Yugoslavia and Bulgaria.

Dec. 10-13. Tsar Boris visited Belgrade and was given a tumultuous reception.

1934, Jan. 27. Boris visited King Charles of Rumania.

Feb. 8. Conclusion of the Balkan Pact, without Bulgaria. the government having refused, even by indirection, to recognize the status quo established by the peace treatics.

May 19. Coup d'état of army officers under Gen. Kimon Gueorguiev, who set up a dictatorship for one year. The policy of reconciliation with Yugoslavia was continued.

June 12. All political parties were declared abolished. Vigorous action taken against the Macedonians, chief opponents of the government's Yugoslav policy.

Sept. 12. Mihailov, the Macedonian leader, fled to Turkey.

1935, Jan. 22. Gueorguiev was forced out and his place taken by Gen. Petko Zlatev, supported by the tsar.

Apr. 18. A purely civilian cabinet was formed by Andrew Tochev, the officers' group having been weakened by factional dissension, and by a disastrous financial policy.

Oct. 2. A plot against the tsar resulted in the arrest of Gueorguiev and other officers, who were, however, soon released.

Nov. 23. A new cabinet was formed by George Kiosseivanov.

1936, Feb. Trial and conviction of a number of military men, including Damyon Veltchev, supposed to be the leader of the military party.

1936, Mar. The Military League was dissolved. To all intents and purposes Tsar Boris was master of the situation. He announced his intention of restoring the constitutional régime, but proceeded very cautiously in that direction. Political parties continued to be forbidden, and steps were taken to keep in check the Zankov group, which had National Socialist leanings.

1937, Jan. 24. CONCLUSION OF THE PACT OF FRIENDSHIP WITH YUGOSLAVIA, bringing to an end the long period of hostility and opening the way for closer relations between Bulgaria and the other Balkan powers.

Mar. The local elections resulted in a striking diminution of the government majorities and revealed the growing dislike for the tsar's personal system.

Oct. 13. More than forty political leaders petitioned the tsar for free elections and a return to constitutionalism. Thereupon the tsar promulgated a new electoral law providing for free voting by men and married women, but forbidding candidates to run as representatives of the old parties.

1938, Mar. The elections were held on four successive Sundays, and resulted in victory for a number of opponents of the government.

May 22. Parliament met for the first time since the military coup of 1935. Its powers were merely consultative.

AGREEMENT WITH July 31. GREECE (acting for the Balkan Entente) recognized Bulgaria's right to rearm. By this time Bulgarian rearmament (in contravention of the treaties) had already made considerable headway, Germany supplying much of the material. This did not, however, imply acceptance of National Socialism by the Bulgarian government. On the contrary, the National Socialist organization was disbanded (Apr. 30) and the government readily accepted an Anglo-French loan of $10,000,000 to support the rearmament program (Aug.). In the growing international tension of 1938-1939 Bulgaria, like most of the lesser states, was pulled this way and that. Great efforts were made to bring her into the Balkan Entente, but this courting merely enabled the government to demand more insistently a revision of the treaties. Claims to the Dobrudja created rather tense relations between Rumania and Bulgaria in the spring of 1939.

1914-1927. FERDINAND I.

1917, July 14. An agrarian law (extended later, 1918–1921, to the new territories) broke up the crown lands and large estates, compensated the owners in state bonds, and distributed the land among the peasants. This policy, long overdue, practically ruined the Conservative Party.

1918, Nov. 10. Rumania re-entered the First World War and occupied Transylvania.

Nov. 27. The National Council of Bessarabia voted for unconditional union with Rumania. This act was not recognized by Russia and the Bessarabian question kept the two countries on tenterhooks for many years.

hooks for many years.

Nov. 28. The Bukovina National Council voted for union with Rumania.

Dec. 1. Transylvania and the Banat voted for union.

Dec. 2. A government, headed by Julius Maniu, Transylvanian peasant leader, was soon (Dec. 14) obliged to give way to a cabinet under Ion Bratianu, leader of the Liberal Party, representing the industrial, commercial, and professional classes of the old kingdom.

1919, Apr. Beginning of the Rumanian advance into Hungary. The Rumanians ultimately occupied Budapest (Aug. 4) and did not evacuate until Nov. 14 (p. 1014).

May 18. Russia declared a state of war.
May 28. The Jews were emancipated and given full citizen rights, but anti-Semitism continued to be rampant, especially in the universities, which had to be closed repeatedly because of anti-Semitic riots.

Oct. Various peasant groups won a victory in the elections, but were unable to effect a change in the established régime.

1920, Mar. 2. Armistice with Russia. Sept. 14. Rumania joined the League of Nations.

Oct. 28. England, France, Italy, and Japan recognized the Rumanian possession of Bessarabia. This treaty was not ratified by England and France until 1924, by Italy until 1927.

1921, Mar. 3. Defensive treaty with Poland and Hungary, directed against Russia.

Apr. 23. ALLIANCE WITH CZECHO-SLOVAKIA, part of the Little Entente treaties (p. 957).

June 7. ALLIANCE WITH YUGO-SLAVIA, completing the Little Entente.

regarding the disappropriation of Transylvanian landholders who had opted for Hungarian citizenship, and whose property rights were laid down in the treaties. All efforts by the League to effect a compromise failed.

1923, Mar. 27. The new constitution abolished the three-class system of voting and introduced the direct, secret ballot.

1924, Apr. Conference with Russia on the Bessarabian question broke down when Rumania refused to hold a plebiscite in the area.

Oct. 1. Introduction of the Gregorian calendar.

1925, Dec. 28. Prince Charles (Carol) renounced his right of succession to the throne and preferred to live in exile with his mistress, Mme. Lupescu. Bratianu and the Liberals were actively hostile to the prince.

1926, Mar. 25. A new electoral law provided that the party polling 40% of the votes should have one-half of the seats in parliament. This move was designed to prevent due representation to the various peasant parties, which were clamoring louder and louder against the existing régime.

Mar. 26. Treaty of alliance with Poland.

June 10. Treaty of friendship with France.

Sept. 16. Treaty of friendship with Italy, which made a large loan in return for oil and other concessions.

Oct. Fusion of the peasant parties to form the new National Peasants'
Party, under Maniu's leadership.

1927, July 20. Death of King Ferdinand.

1927-1930. MICHAEL I (b. 1921). Principal regent Prince Nicholas, brother of Prince Charles, the father of Michael.

Nov. 24. Death of Ion Bratianu, energetic leader of the Liberal Party.

1928, Mar. 18. The peasants loudly demanded the dismissal of the cabinet.

May 6. Congress of the National Peasants' Party at Alba Julia, demanding representative government, decentralization, and reform.

Nov. 9. JULIUS MANIU became premier. He set out to purge the administration, make easier the influx of foreign capital, improve the lots of the peasants, etc.

Dec. 12. In the elections, at last free of pressure and corruption, the Peasants' Party scored a great victory.

1930, June 6. Prince Charles arrived by airplane and was accepted by Maniu. The parliament (June 8) revoked the law excluding him from the throne. Michael was put aside in favor of his father.

1930- CAROL (CHARLES) II. He very soon fell out with Maniu, brought back Mme. Lupescu, and attempted to establish his personal rule.

Oct. 6. Resignation of Maniu, because of ill health. He was succeeded by his lieutenant, George Mironescu. Dec. 23. Ion Duca became leader of the Liberal Party on the death of Vintila Bratianu, brother of Ion.

1930. The optants' dispute with Hungary settled by the Brocchi Plan (worked out by Italy and England): Hungary was to assume the claims of the optants and was to receive contributions for this purpose from Czechoslovakia and other countries.

1931, Apr. 18. The king appointed a coalition (National Union) cabinet under Prof. Nicholas Iorga, his former tutor. This was regarded as a prelude to a royal dictatorship.

May. A new electoral law assigned 60% of the seats in parliament to professional groups.

June 1. In the elections, manipulated as of old, the Peasants' Party was completely defeated.

1932, Jan.-May. Negotiations with Russia, held under Polish auspices at Warsaw, failed to effect a settlement of the Bessarabian question.

May 31. Iorga resigned, after failure to secure a loan from France.

June 6. A new cabinet was formed by Alexander Vaida-Voevod, Peasant leader

July 17. The Peasants won a great victory in the elections. But their position was weakened by the inability of Maniu to get along with the king and by rivalry between Maniu and Vaida-Voevod. Oct. 20 Maniu took over the premiership (until Jan. 5, 1933).

1933, Jan. A system of League supervision of Rumanian finances was introduced for four years.

July. A PACT OF NON-AGGRESSION was finally concluded with Russia;
this involved tacit recognition of Rumania's possession of Bessarabia, and was the direct result of the victory of Hitler in Germany and of Russia's preoccupation with the FarEastern situation.

Nov. 14. A cabinet was formed by Ion Duca, Liberal leader, the Liberals returning to power as a result of the disintegration of the Peasants' Party.

Dec. 20. In the elections the government groups won a great victory, as usual.

Dec. 29. Duca was assassinated by members of the Iron Guard, a fascist, strongly anti-Semitic organization, led by Corneliu Codreanu. Martial law was proclaimed at once and leaders of the Iron Guard arrested. George Tartarescu took over the premiership.

1934, Feb. 8. CONCLUSION OF THE BALKAN PACT between Rumania, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Turkey.
The consummation of the plan was largely the work of Nicholas Titulescu, the Rumanian foreign minister.

May. The peasants supported the Liberal Party in frustrating an effort by the king to establish a dictatorship, following a plot against his life.

June 9. Agreement between Rumania, Poland, and Russia, guaranteeing each other's frontiers.

Sept. Reconciliation of Maniu and Vaida-Voevod. Renewed attacks of the Peasants' Party upon Mme. Lupescu and the royal camarilla. These were of little effect and the old feud between the peasant groups and the court soon was overshadowed by the rapid spread of fascism and anti-Semitism. Early in 1936, Feb. The anti-Semitic Christian League, headed by Prof. A. C.

Cuza, and the National Christian Party, led by the poet Octavian Goga, united with one wing of the Peasants' Party, under VaidaVoevod, thus forming a strong reactionary bloc not much different from the fascist Iron Guard.

Aug. 29. Foreign minister Titulescu, representing close connections with France, Russia, and the Little Entente against Germany, was forced out by the groups of the Right, which were favorable to Germany and Nazi ideals. Nevertheless the king and his ministers attempted to maintain friendly relations with France and Czechoslovakia, buying armaments from Prague with money lent by France.

1937, Dec. 21. The elections, to the surprise of the whole world, resulted in a defeat for the government. Thereupon the Tartarescu government resigned (Dec. 26) and King Carol, once more astounding the world, appointed

Dec. 28. OCTAVIAN GOGA prime minister, despite the fact that his National Christian Party had gained only 10% of the votes in the election. Goga at once embarked upon an orgy of anti-Semitic legislation, forbidding Jews to own land, depriving those naturalized after 1920 of their citizenship, barring Jews from the professions, etc. At the same time Goga aimed at the establishment of a dictatorship by sending his party troops into all localities.

1938, Jan. 18. King Carol dissolved the Parliament, which had not yet met. New elections were arranged for March. This unconstitutional procedure led to protests from the non-fascist parties, while the anti-Semitic policy quickly brought the country to the verge of business collapse. Remonstrances from England and France appear also to have undermined Goga's position. Thereupon

Feb. 10. The king dismissed Goga, using as a pretext the fact that the courts had invalidated several of the anti-Semitic laws. Goga and the fascists had thoroughly discredited themselves and thereby had really strengthened the position of the king, who now assumed complete control of the situation. A new "concentration" cabinet, containing seven former premiers, was established under the leadership of the patriarch, Miron Cristea. The constitution was suspended and all political parties were suppressed. Rigid censorship was instituted. These moves were violently opposed both by the fascist Iron Guard and by the Peasants' Party of Maniu, but

Feb. 24. A plebiscite, properly managed by the government, approved Carol's action by an overwhelming vote (only 5300 opposed). The king thereupon decreed that in future the Senate should be one-half appointive, that only the crown might initiate legislation, and that the ruler might govern by decree. A new electoral law restricted the franchise to those of 30 years of age and provided for elections on an occupational basis.

Apr. 19. Codreanu was condemned to 6 months' imprisonment for libel, and then (May 27) to 10 years at hard labor for treason. The government's attack upon the fascists now assumed major proportions, hundreds of Iron Guardists being arrested and imprisoned after discovery of an alleged plot against the king.

Aug. 4. A new nationalities statute gave minorities equal rights with Rumanians in language, religion, and race. This was evidently a move designed to secure the government wider support. By a new administrative arrangement (Aug. 13) the old racial divisions were wiped out and a new system of 10 provinces was inaugurated.

Nov. 30. DEATH OF CODREANU.

He and 13 other Iron Guardists were reported shot by their guards while being moved from one prison to another. The explanation did not satisfy everyone, least of all the German Nazis, who described the episode as cold murder. But the Rumanian government persisted in the chosen course and stopped at nothing to stamp out the fascist movement.

1939, Mar. 6. Armand Calinescu became premier on the death of Patriarch Cristea.

Apr. 13. Great Britain and France guaranteed Rumanian independence and integrity following the German annihilation of Czechoslovakia and rumors of a German ultimatum to Rumania. But the Bucharest government nevertheless concluded a commercial agreement with Germany giving the latter broad scope for expansion and control of Rumanian industry. In short, the government attempted to straddle the two groups of powers in Europe.

May 10. In the elections under the new system (only official candidates, elected by professional organizations) the government secured a docile body. Both the chamber of deputies and the Senate was reduced in number by one-third.

12. RUSSIA (UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS)

On Germany's declaration of war (Aug. 1, 1914), the opposition parties in Russia declared their readiness to put aside domestic quarrels and support the government in the work of national defense. Since the government failed to respond, political discontent developed rapidly. Public opinion was deeply stirred by 1915, May. The great Russian defeat in Galicia (p. 922), and openly accused the government of inefficiency and criminal negligence in failing to supply the armies.

June 25. The tsar was obliged to dismiss Gen. Sukhomlinov, the minister of war (tried and convicted by the provisional government in 1917), and to admit representatives of the Duma and other public bodies (the Union of Zemstvos and Municipalities, the War Industry Committee, etc.) to direct participation in the work of army supply and the mobilization of industry. Nicholas refused, however, to comply with the demand of the progressive bloc in the Duma for an entirely new ministry enjoying the confidence of the country and committed to a more liberal policy. The situation was aggravated when Sept. 5. The tsar decided to dismiss the popular commander in chief, Grand Duke Nicholas, and to assume the command himself. The tsar's absence from the capital opened the way for domination of the Empress Alexandra, known to be bitterly hostile to the Duma and to be under the influence of the notorious adventurer, Gregory Rasputin. The government was completely discredited in the eyes of the public when 1916, Feb. 3. Boris Stürmer, arch-conservative and allegedly pro-German, replaced Goremykin as chief of the cabinet. July 23 Stürmer took charge of the foreign office. Rumors of treason in high places undermined the morale of the army and of the population generally. To all this was added a grave economic problem: shortage of labor, due to repeated mobilizations; disorganization of railroad transport, failure of food and fuel supplies in the cities.

Nov. 18. Meeting of the Duma. In a turbulent session the leaders denounced the "dark forces" in the government and warned the country of impending disaster unless there was an immediate change of policy.

Nov. 24. Alexander Trepov replaced Stürmer as president of the council of ministers and the government embarked upon a policy of repression of dissatisfaction. But opposition continued, and

Dec. 30. Rasputin was assassinated by Prince Felix Yussupov and other aristocrats. Even these drastic measures were barren of results, and in some political and military circles there was discussion of a palace revolution. Before any plans could materialize

1917, Mar. 8. Strikes and riots broke out in St. Petersburg (named Petrograd at the beginning of the war). These were followed by

Mar. 10. A general mutiny of the troops in the capital, which sealed the fate of the old régime.

Mar. 11. The Duma refused to obey an imperial decree ordering its dissolution, and established

Mar. 12. A PROVISIONAL GOVERN-MENT, headed by Prince George Lvov (chairman of the Union of Zemstvos and Municipalities). The new government included Prof. Paul Miliukov, leader of the Constitutional Democrats (as minister for foreign affairs); Alexander Guchkov, leader of the Octobrists (minister of war); and Alexander Kerensky, the only Socialist (minister of justice).

Mar. 15. Nicholas II abdicated for himself and his son in favor of his brother Michael, who in turn (Mar. 16) abdicated in favor of the provisional government pending election by a constituent assembly.

Mar.-Nov. THE RULE OF THE PRO-VISIONAL GOVERNMENT. At the very outset the new régime proclaimed the civic liberties and recognized legal equality of all citizens without social, religious, or racial discrimination. Finland was recognized as independent within a Russian federation (Mar. 21); Poland's complete independence was accepted (Mar. 30); Estonia was granted autonomy (Apr. 12). At the same time the government announced a program of far-reaching social reforms, including distribution of land among the peasants (confiscation of imperial and monastery lands, Mar. 30). But the decision on these and other matters was reserved for the constituent assembly, which was being arranged for. From the very outset the provisional government, essentially liberal and bourgeois, found itself in Conflict with the Petrograd Soviet (Council of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies), which had been organized by the Socialists Mar. The government pledged itself (Mar. 18, May 1) to the continuation of the war against the Central Powers, in common with the Allies, until the attainment of a "victorious end." It attempted to maintain and increase the efficiency of the army and proceeded but cautiously toward its democratization. The Soviet leaders, on the other hand, insisted on a radical revision of war aims, renunciation of secret diplomatic agreements concluded by the tsarist government (and promising Russia Constantinople), and the speedy conclusion of a "general democratic peace," without annexations or indemnities. Suspecting the generals of counter-revolutionary tendencies, the Soviet issued (Mar. 14) the famous Order No. 1, which deprived the officers of all authority excepting for strategic operations, and entrusted the administration of the army to committees elected by both officers and men. The counterorder of the provisional government was virtually ignored and the committee system was subsequently introduced in all army detachments. The antagonism of the Soviet against the government became more outspoken when

Apr. 16. Vladimir Lenin, Zinoviev, Radek, Lunacharski, and other Bolshevik leaders arrived at Petrograd from Switzerland, having been transported through Germany in a sealed carriage, the German high command having calculated that these extremists would soon undermine the pro-Allied provisional government. Lenin's program was: (1) Transfer of power from the "bourgeois" provisional government to the Soviets; (2) immediate cessation of the war, if necessary by the acceptance of a separate peace with the Central Powers; (3) immediate seizure of land by the peasants, without awaiting the decision of the constituent assembly; (4) control of industry by committees of workers. Lenin was ably supported by Leon Trotsky (Bronstein), who returned from the United States and England early in May, but his program was not accepted by the more moderate (Menshevik) wing of the Socialist Party, nor by the Social Revolutionaries. Consequently much difference of opinion and considerable friction was generated within the Soviet.

May 14, 16. Guchkov and Miliukov were obliged to resign from the provisional government as a result of agitation over war aims and army organiza-The government was remade, and now accepted a policy of no annexations and no indemnities, though still declaring against a separate peace. Several Socialists were included in the cabinet, and Kerensky became minister of war. He undertook to revive the war spirit and the fighting power of the army on the basis of the new "revolutionary discipline." After a spectacular visit to the front and a stirring appeal to the soldiers, he ordered the June 29-July 7. Russian offensive against the Austro-German forces. After a brief initial success the offensive collapsed and the disorganized Russian troops were completely defeated (p. 940). The radicals now took the initiative.

July 16-18. The Bolsheviks attempted to seize power in Petrograd, but the effort was clearly premature. movement was suppressed by the government and many of the leaders (including Trotsky) were arrested. Lenin managed to escape and went into hiding in Finland. This coup, as well as disagreement between ministers regarding the burning question of land reform and the status of national minorities (assumption of power in the Ukraine by the local Rada, June 26; establishment of Gen. Kaledin as hetman of the Don Cossacks, June 30; Finnish declaration of complete independence, July 20), re-

July 20. The resignation of Prince Lvov, whose place was taken by Kerensky. The position of the government, however, remained very precarious, in view of the growing restlessness of the masses, who suffered from war-weariness and material privations, and were all too ready to listen to Bolshevik propaganda. On the other hand, the conservative elements opposed the government because of its alleged weakness in dealing with the Bolsheviks. The advocates of a strong line found a champion in Gen. Lavr Kornilov, recently appointed commander in chief. A rift between Kerensky and Kornilov finally led to

The Kornilov attack upon Sept. 9-14. the government. Kerensky had dismissed Kornilov, who refused to obey and ordered his troops to advance on Petrograd, his avowed aim being to destroy the Soviet and liberate the provisional government from Socialist domination. movement broke down because of defection on the part of many soldiers and because of mobilization of the radical elements in the capital, to whom Kerensky appealed for support against the "counter-revolution" (Trotsky and some other Bolshevik leaders were released from prison). Kornilov was defeated, but Kerensky now found himself under the domination of his Bolshevik allies. The masses had come to suspect of counter-revolutionary designs not only the army command, but the provisional government also. Bolshevik influence made rapid headway among the factory workers and among the soldiers of the Petrograd garrison. In Oct. the Bolsheviks secured a majority in the Soviet, Trotsky becoming its chairman. Thereupon Lenin decided to attempt a coup.

Nov. 6. (O.S. Oct. 24). THE BOL-SHEVIK REVOLUTION. The Bolsheviks, led by the military revolutionary committee, the soldiers of the Petrograd garrison, the sailors from Kronstadt, and the workers' Red Guards, captured most of the government offices, took the Winter Palace by storm, and arrested the members of the provisional government. Kerensky managed to escape, and, after a futile attempt to organize resistance, went into hiding and subsequently into exile abroad.

Nov. 7. The Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, from which the moderate Socialists bolted, approved the coup and handed over power to the Bolsheviks.

The history of Russia (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) after Nov. 1917 may be conveniently divided into three periods: (1) The Period of Militant Communism (1917–1921); (2) the Period of the New Economic Policy (1921–1927); (3) the Period of the New Socialist Offensive (1928–).

The new government (organized Nov. 7) assumed the name Council of People's Commissars. It was headed by Lenin, and included Trotsky (commissar for foreign affairs), Joseph Stalin (commissar for national minorities). To protect itself and to crush opposition, the council organized (Dec. 20) the Extraordinary Commission to Combat Counter-Revolution (the Cheka, later known as the G.P.U.).

1030 EUROPE

Nov. 25. The elections to the constituent assembly returned 420 Social Revolutionaries as against only 225 Bolsheviks. When the assembly met in Petrograd (Jan. 18, 1018) it was dispersed at once by the Red Troops. Therewith one of the most influential elements of the opposition was disposed of. Some of the Social Revolutionaries joined in the anti-Bolshevik movements which soon began to take form.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC 1917-1921. POLICY. The victorious Bolsheviks at once undertook the reorganization of society along collectivist lines. A Land Decree (Nov. 7) ordered immediate partition of the large estates and distribution to the peasants. But Feb. 19, 1918, the nationalization of the land was proclaimed (all land to be the property of the state, and only those willing to cultivate it themselves to be permitted to use it). No further efforts were made in the direction of collectivization, but when the civil war brought the cities and the armies into danger of starvation, the peasants were ordered (Dec. 14, 1920) to turn over to the government their entire surplus (the food levy). As they were reluctant to do so, and saw no prospect of any return in industrial goods, the government was driven to adopt forcible requisitioning, which created widespread discontent.

On their advent to power the Bolsheviks at once declared all banks nationalized, confiscating private accounts. The national debt was repudiated (Jan. 28, 1918). The workmen were given control over the factories (Nov. 28, 1917), and by the summer of 1918 all the larger plants (and subsequently the smaller ones also) were nationalized (law of June 28, 1918). The workers were instructed to join government-con-trolled trade unions, and were denied the right to strike. In emergencies the government resorted to a system of compulsory labor. Private trade was gradually suppressed and the government undertook the distribution of food and other commodities among the urban populations, using a rationing system as the basis and making use also of the co-operatives. All Church property was confiscated (Dec. 17, 1917) and all religious instruction in the schools was abolished. Only civil marriages were thenceforth to be recognized. The Gregorian calendar was introduced on Jan. 31, 1918.

1917-1918. CONCLUSION OF PEACE WITH THE CENTRAL POWERS. In accordance with its avowed policy, the new government at once (Nov. 7) published a Decree of Peace, that is, an appeal to all belligerent states to start immediate peace parleys. The Russian commander, Gen. Dukhonin, was dismissed (Nov. 21) for refusing to offer an armistice. His place was taken by the Bolshevik, Krylenko.

Nov. 22. Trotsky again proposed to the Allies the conclusion of an armistice. The Allies, unwilling to accept a peace on the basis of no annexations and no indemnities, evaded, but the Germans expressed their readiness to negotiate (Nov. 28). Thereupon the Bolshevik government, in order to expose the designs of the capitalist governments, published (Dec. 5 et seq.) the secret treaties concluded between Russia and her allies. At the same time

Dec. 5. An armistice was concluded between Russia and the Central Powers. Negotiations were opened at Brest-Litovsk Dec. 3, but broke down Dec. 28 when it was revealed that the Germans demanded the cession of Poland and the western Russian territories, supposedly on the basis of self-determination. The Germans therefore arranged for 1918, Jan. 28. The independence of the Ukraine, with which they concluded a separate peace (Feb. 9). By way of protest the Bolsheviks

Feb. 10. Ended the war by proclamation, but this failed to satisfy the Germans, who resumed the offensive (Feb. 18), advanced on Petrograd and thereby obliged the Bolsheviks to conclude the

Mar. 3. TREATY OF BREST-LITOVSK, by which Russia lost Poland, the Ukraine, and all of the borderlands occupied by non-Russian nationalities.

Mar. 9. The government moved the capital from Petrograd (renamed Leningrad, Jan. 26, 1924) to Moscow. This was partly due to the exposed position of Petrograd with relation to the Germans and their satellites, and partly to the threat of counter-revolution emanating from the borderlands. Monarchists and members of the propertied classes, who favored political and economic restoration, as well as Liberals and Moderate Socialists who were opposed to the Communistic dictatorship were all more or less united in their refusal to accept the disastrous Brest-Litovsk Treaty. The British and French, who regarded the Bolsheviks as the tools of the German general staff and who were eager to keep supplies and munitions from falling into the hands of the Germans, encouraged and supported movements among the opponents of the Bolsheviks. Independent governments were established all along the Russian frontiers (Lithuania, Dec. 11, 1917; Moldavia, Dec. 15; Republic of the Don, Jan. 10, 1918; Ukraine, Jan. 28; Transcaucasia, Apr. 22, etc.). The revolt of the Don Cossacks, led by Gens. Kornilov and Kaledin, Dec. 9, 1917, may be said to mark the beginning of the 1918-1920. GREAT CIVIL WAR. Bolshevik government was at first faced with the prospect of war without anything like an adequate trained force. During the first period of the war it suffered one reverse after another, but gradually a new Red Army of volunteers was organized. Under the leadership of Trotsky (who had become commissar for war) it developed into a regular army based on conscription and subject to strict discipline. The Bolsheviks had the advantage of fighting on the inside lines and they derived a certain measure of support from the fact that they were defending Russian territory. At the same time the lack of cohesion among the counter-revolutionary movements and the fitful attitude of the Allied Powers constantly hampered the operations of the Whites.

(1) The War with the Cossacks. Operations began with the new year. Gen. Kaledin committed suicide after a defeat (Feb. 13) and Gen. Kornilov was killed in battle soon afterward (Apr. 13). The command in the south was taken over by Gen. Denikin, supported by Gen. Krasnov (hetman of the Don Cossacks, May 11).

(2) The Struggle for the Ukraine. The Ukraine had declared its independence of Russia (Jan. 28, 1918) and the Moderate Socialist government at Kiev had concluded a separate peace with the Germans and Austrians (Feb. 9). Thereupon the Bolsheviks attacked and took Kiev (Feb. 18), but they were soon ejected by the Germans (Mar. 2), who then took also Odessa (Mar. 13) and overran the whole Ukraine, from which they tried, rather unsuccessfully, to secure much-needed food supplies. With German aid a more conservative government, under Gen. Skoropadsky, was set up, but after the end of the World War, Skoropadsky was overthrown (Nov. 15) by the Ukrainian Socialists, under Gen. Simon Petliura. The French occupied Odessa (Dec. 18), but the Bolsheviks, having assumed the offensive, took Kiev (Feb. 3, 1919) and expelled the Allied forces from Odessa (Apr. 8). The Ukraine became a Soviet Republic, which was conquered by the White armies of Gen. Denikin (Aug.-Dec. 1919) only to be retaken by the Bolsheviks (Dec. 17) and then invaded by the Poles (May 7, 1920). The Bolsheviks managed to drive the Poles back and Dec. 28 concluded a treaty with the Ukrainian Soviet government, recognizing the latter's independence. Dec. 30 the Ukraine joined with the other Soviet Republics to form the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

(3) The War in White Russia and the Baltic region. Most of this area continued to be occupied or dominated by the Germans down to and beyond the conclusion of the World War armistice. In the autumn of 1919 a White army under Gen. Yudenitch advanced on Petrograd (Oct. 19), but was forced back by the Bolsheviks. The Soviet government recognized the independence of Estonia (Feb. 2, 1920), of Lithuania (July 12), of Latvia (Aug. 11), and of Finland (Oct. 14). White Russia continued to be a Soviet Republic until its union with the other Soviet Republics in 1922.

(4) Allied intervention in northern Rus-The British landed a force at Murmansk June 23, 1918, primarily with the object of holding German forces in the east and of protecting Allied stores from falling into hostile hands. Aug. 2 the British and French took Archangel and began to support a puppet government of northern Russia. The Americans also sent a force. and during the spring of 1919 there was considerable fighting between the Allies and the Bolsheviks. The French were the most ardent advocates of more extensive intervention against the Bolsheviks, but neither the British nor the Americans were willing, after the armistice, to go beyond financial and other support for the anti-Bolshevik movements. Sept. 30, 1919, the Allies abandoned Archangel and then (Oct. 12) Murmansk. These territories were quickly taken over by the Bolsheviks.

(5) Campaigns of Denikin and Wrangel in the Caucasus and southern Russia. The Caucasian states (Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan) declared their independence Apr. 22 and May 26, 1918. After the withdrawal of the Germans and Austrians from southern Russia, the Bolsheviks made an effort to reconquer this territory, so valuable for its oil, but Gen. Denikin defeated them (Jan. 1919). After a rather spectacular advance northward, Denikin was himself driven back to the Black Sea coast (Apr.), where he maintained himself until the autumn. In another swift offensive he then captured Odessa (Aug. 18) and took Kiev (Sept. 2), only to be forced to retreat again (Dec.). By Mar. 27, 1920, his last base fell to the Bolsheviks and Denikin turned over the command to Gen. Wrangel. The Bolsheviks meanwhile advanced into the Caucasus and took Baku (Apr. 28), but Wrangel, starting from the region north of the Sea of Azov, began to overrun much of southern Russia (June-Nov.). Finally, however, the Bolshevik forces, freed by the conclusion of the war with Poland (see below), were able to concentrate against Wrangel, who was forced back to the Crimea (Nov. 1) and then obliged to evacuate his army to Constantinople (Nov. 14). Early in 1921 Soviet governments were set up in Georgia (Feb. 25) and in Armenia (Apr. 2). By the treaty with Turkey (Oct. 13) Batum was restored to Russia. Mar. 12, 1022, the Soviet governments of Georgia. Armenia, and Azerbaijan were combined to form the Transcaucasian Socialist Soviet Republic, which Dec. 30 became part of the larger Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

(6) The war in Siberia and eastern Japanese forces were landed at Vladivostok Dec. 30, 1917, at a time when the Czech legions (organized before the revolution out of large numbers of Austrian war prisoners) had already started their march toward Vladivostok with the purpose of ultimately joining the Allied forces in Europe. Disagreement between them and the Soviet government led to armed conflict (June 1918), in the course of which the Czechs seized control of the Trans-Siberian Railway and formed an alliance with local anti-Bolshevik forces. An autonomous Siberian government had already been formed at Omsk. This government later merged with the directory organized in Ufa by former members of the constituent assembly (mostly Moderate Socialists). Meanwhile the Czechs extended their operations to the Volga region, taking Ekaterinburg (July 26) and other places. At Omsk the military and conservative elements executed a coup (Nov. 18) by which the Socialists were forced out of the government and Adm. Alexander Kolchak was proclaimed Supreme Ruler of Russia. Siberian White army then staged an advance into eastern Russia, capturing Perm (Dec. 24) and Ufa. But the Bolsheviks initiated a vigorous counter-offensive, taking Orenburg and Ekaterinburg (Jan. 25, 27, 1919) and gradually forcing Kolchak back into Siberia. They recaptured Omsk (Nov. 14) and forced the White army to fall back on Irkutsk. Kolchak gave way to Gen. Semenov (Dec. 17) and was subsequently captured and executed by the Bolsheviks (Feb. 7). The Bolsheviks attempted to take Vladivostok by a coup (Jan. 30), but were obliged to yield to the greater power of the Japanese. In order to avoid conflict, the Soviet government of Russia set up a buffer state in eastern Siberia (Apr. 6). This was known as the Far Eastern Republic, with capital at Chita. When the Japanese finally evacuated Vladivostok (Oct. 25, 1922), the city was occupied by troops of the Far Eastern Republic, which was itself annexed to Soviet Russia Nov. 19, 1922.

Other important developments of this confused and crucial period were:

1918, July 6. The assassination of the German ambassador, Count von Mirbach, by a social revolutionary. This resulted in increased demands by the Germans on Russia, which in turn ruined all hope of cordial relations between Germany and the Soviet government.

July 10. PROMULGATION OF THE SOVIET CONSTITUTION, which was adopted by the Fifth All-Russian Congress of Soviets. The main lines of the soviet system were these: (1) Local soviets elected representatives to the provincial congresses of soviets, which in turn sent delegates to the All-Russian (subsequently All-Union) Congress of Soviets; (2) the latter elected the executive committee, a permanent body which acted in the intervals between sessions of the congress; the congress also elected the council of people's commissars; (3) elections were held on an occupational, and not on a territorial basis: the factory workers were more generously represented than the peasants, while the "non-toiling" bourgeois classes (including the clergy) were disenfranchised; (4) All elections were open, with no provision for secret ballot. In practice this system of "soviet democracy" was dominated by a dictatorship of (or for) the proletariat, and this in turn was exercised by the Bolshevik Party (renamed the Communist Party in Mar. 1918). No other parties were permitted, and the press and other channels of expression were put under sweeping government control. The Communist Party was governed by a central committee, within which there was a smaller group called the political bureau. This latter was the real governing body of the country. Lenin's authority remained supreme in both party and government until his death.

July 16. Murder of Nicholas II, Tsarina Alexandra, and their children in a cellar at Ekaterinburg, where they had been kept in captivity. On the outbreak of the revolution the imperial family had been confined first in the palace of Tsarskoe Selo. Thence it had been moved to Tobolsk and finally (Apr. 1918) to Ekaterinburg.
The murder was perpetrated by local Bolsheviks who feared the imminent capture of the city by the advancing Czechs and Whites.

Aug. 30. An attempt was made by a social revolutionary to assassinate Lenin. Coming at the time of severe crisis, this move created a panic and inaugurated a systematic reign of terror by the Bolsheviks, in the course of which huge numbers of intellectuals and bourgeois of all types were wiped out.

1919, Mar. 2. Foundation of the Third International (Communist), an organization for the propagation of communist doctrine abroad with the purpose of bringing about the world revolution, on which Lenin and his associates reckoned with confidence in the stormy period following the end of the war.

1920, Apr. 25-Oct. 12. WAR WITH PO-LAND which, in agreement with Petliura, attempted to wrest the Ukraine from the Bolsheviks. The Poles quickly overran the country, taking Kiev (May 7), but the Bolsheviks launched a vigorous counter-attack, and drove the Poles out of Kiev (June 11) and Vilna (July 15). By Aug. 14 the Russians were on the outskirts of Warsaw. But the Poles, vigorously aided by the French (Gen. Weygand) made a stand and were soon able to turn the tables. The Bolsheviks were forced to fall back and abandon their Polish conquests. The preliminary treaty of Riga (Oct. 12) was followed by the definitive Treaty of Riga (Mar. 18, 1921), which defined the frontier between the two countries.

The effects of the Allied blockade and of the devastating civil war, together with the revolutionary economic policy of the government, led to an almost complete collapse of the Russian economy by 1921. There was a sharp decline in production in both industry and agriculture, widespread disorganization of transport, acute shortage of food and fuel, especially in the cities. Popular discontent found expression in numerous peasant uprisings during 1920 and in rioting of the factory workers in Petrograd, culminating finally in 1921, Feb. 23-Mar. 17. The mutiny and uprising of the sailors at Kronstadt, which was put down only with difficulty and after much bloodshed. This situation finally forced the Communist Party to adopt

Mar. 17 et seq. THE NEW ECO-NOMIC POLICY (often spoken of as the NEP), sponsored by Lenin himself. To placate the peasants, the food levy was abolished, and in its place there was introduced a limited grain tax, thus leaving the peasants at least part of the surplus. To enable them to dispose of this surplus, freedom of trade within the country was partially restored. Subsequently (1922) a new land statute was passed which made possible reconstruction of small individual farms and even permitted, under certain conditions, limited use of hired labor and lease of land. In industry some of the small plants were returned to former owners and licenses were given to private persons to start new enterprises. Private commercial establishments were also permitted in the cities. In course of time the financial system was recast on a semi-capitalistic basis: the state bank was given the right to issue bills backed either by goods or by foreign bonds; attempts were made to stabilize the currency (the devaluated paper money was replaced by the new chervonets bills). Large industry and transport, however, remained nationalized, and foreign trade continued to be a government monopoly.

The NEP was declared to be a "temporary retreat" from communism, necessary for purposes of economic reconstruction. After the great famine of 1921-1922 (caused by drought, but aggravated by the economic collapse that preceded it), the national economy recovered at a rapid pace. Production in industry and agriculture reached the pre-war level and there was marked improvement in living standards both in the cities and in the countryside. Along with this recovery went an abatement of the Red terror and a slight relaxation of governmental censorship and repression. With the end of the civil war, more attention could be given to cultural work, and the government introduced an ambitious educational program aiming at a speedy elimination of illiteracy.

1922, Apr. 10-May 19. Russia took part in the economic conference at Geneva (p. 960), thus for the first time indicating a readiness to collaborate with non-Bolshevik countries for common ends. The conference ended in failure, though it resulted in

Apr. 16. THE TREATY OF RAPALLO between Germany and Soviet Russia. The agreement provided for economic co-operation and established close political connections. Despite the indignation of the other powers, Russia and Germany, as outcast powers, held steadfastly to the pact, which was supplemented by a commercial treaty (Oct. 12, 1925), periodically renewed, even after Hitler's advent to power in Germany.

Dec. 30. The Union of Socialist Soviet Republics was organized, bringing together Russia, the Ukraine, White Russia, and Transcaucasia in one federation. The member states retained a large measure of cultural autonomy, but political control was exercised from Moscow through the All-Union Communist Party organization.

1924, Jan. 21. THE DEATH OF LENIN.

This important event marked the beginning of a struggle for power within the inner councils of the party and the government. The chief contestants were Trotsky and Stalin. The latter at first allied himself with Leo Kamenev (Rosenfeld) and Gregory Zinoviev (Radomyslsky), but these two soon quarreled with Stalin and adhered to the opposition bloc of Trotsky. Open conflict of the factions broke out in 1926.

Feb. 1. Great Britain recognized the Bolshevik régime, and was soon followed by most of the other European and some extra-European powers (Italy, Feb. 7; France, Oct. 28).

1925, Jan. 21. Japan recognized the Soviet government and agreed to withdraw from northern Sakhalin (evacuation Apr. 4).

May 12. Revision of the federal constitution. A number of new republics were added to the federation (Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Kazakistan, etc.).

1926, July-Oct. Victory of Stalin over the Leftist opposition bloc led by Trotsky. This group insisted on discontinuation of the NEP policy, the speedingup of "socialist construction," and the active resumption of work for the world revolution. Trotsky held that a communist régime in one country was an anomaly and that the proletarian revolution could be safe only when the whole world had been directed into the same channel. Trotsky, Zinoviev, Radek, and other leaders were now expelled from the political bureau of the party.

1927, May 26. Great Britain severed relations with Soviet Russia because of continued Bolshevik propaganda in contravention of treaty agreements.

Dec. 27. Definitive victory of the Stalin faction over the Trotsky group, when the 15th All-Union Congress of the Communist Party condemned all "deviation from the general party line" as interpreted by Stalin. Trotsky and his followers were banished to the provinces after expulsion from the party. In Jan. 1929 Trotsky was expelled from the Union and was obliged to take refuge in Constantinople. Later he moved to Norway and ultimately to Mexico. The same party congress made several decisions which signified the end of the NEP and the inauguration of a

NEW SOCIALIST OFFENSIVE. A program of speedy industrialization was introduced in the form of several successive Five-Year Plans (beginning Oct. 1, 1928). In the realization of this program considerable success was achieved in the development of heavy industries (primarily for purposes of national defense). But production of manufactured products still lagged far behind the needs of the population and the government was constantly faced with inefficiency, to say nothing of ill-will (1930- : a series of trials of technicians for mismanagement and sabotage). In the field of agriculture the government now returned to a policy of socialization by pooling individual peasant farms in large concerns, such as the collective farms (kolkhoz) and the state farms (sovkhoz). The collectivization campaign in the villages was carried out by means of both propaganda and coercion (drastic measures against the recalcitrant peasants and especially against the well-to-do farmers or kulaks, who were completely wiped out). The objectives of the government were substantially achieved, and within a few years the great majority of the peasants were collectivized, the government controlling the output of the new farms.

1929, Nov. 17. Expulsion of Bukharin and other members of the Rightist opposition. This group had advocated further concession to the peasants along the lines of the NEP. Stalin was now undisputed master of the situation and dictator of Russia.

Dec. 22. An agreement with China brought to an end a prolonged dispute and a period of acute tension over the conflicting claims to the Chinese Eastern Railway. In the period from 1924 to 1926 the Soviet government had actively supported the nationalist movement in China, but after a quarrel the Russian agents had been expelled and relations had rapidly degenerated.

over Russia, due in part, at least, to the excesses of the government's agrarian policy. The famine centered in the Ukraine and the northern Caucasus and the government did its utmost to conceal it from the world. The desperate situation resulted in a reduction of the amount of foodstuffs taken by the state and in permission to the collective farms to sell at least part of their surplus produce.

1982, July 25. Conclusion of non-aggression pacts with Poland, Estonia, Latvia, and Finland, followed by a similar agreement with France (Nov. 29). These pacts reflected the government's uneasiness about developments in the Far East, notably the establishment of the Man-chukuoan state under Japanese auspices. Relations between Russia and Japan degenerated rapidly and considerable tension developed with regard to the Chinese Eastern Railway. This particular issue was settled by the sale of the Russians' interest for 140,000,000 yen (Mar. 23, 1935), but Japanese activity on the border of Outer Mongolia (allied to Russia and really under Russian protection) gave rise to a series of "incidents" of a dangerous nature. As a result of Japanese expansion in eastern Asia and the growing threat to the Russian position, the Moscow government not only attempted to stabilize relations with its European neighbors, but began to take an active part in the Disarmament Conference (p. 962) and in general international cooperation. This new departure was signalized by a notable lull in the activities of the Third International.

About one-third of the members (1,000,000) were expelled for one reason or another. In Apr. a number of British engineers were put on trial for sabotage. The British government protested and put an embargo on Russian goods. Though convicted, the engineers were permitted to leave the country, but Anglo-Russian relations continued to be distant.

Nov. 17. Recognition of the Soviet government by the United States brought to an end a long period of estrangement. Trade relations were opened and the Russian government promised to abstain from propaganda in the United States.

1934, Apr. 4. The non-aggression pacts with Poland and the Baltic states were extended into 10-year agreements. In view of the National Socialist victory in Germany (p. 1000) and the openly expressed hostility of the new German regime to communism, the Soviet Union felt more Trade relations than ever endangered. with Germany continued and even developed for a few years, but the Moscow government at once embarked upon an extensive program of armament on land, sea, and air. Within a few years the Russians had a formidable air fleet and had made considerable progress toward the construction of a powerful navy (esp. submarines). In accord with the effort to secure support in Europe, Russia made

June 9. Agreements with Czechoslovakia and Rumania, at long last recognizing the loss of Bessarabia.

Sept. 18. JOINED THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, which before had been roundly denounced. Russia now took an active part in all work for the furtherance of collective security and supported France in the scheme for an eastern European pact along the lines of the Locarno agreements.

Dec. 1. The assassination of Serge Kirov, a close collaborator of Stalin, revealed the existence of a strong and desperate opposition to the régime within the ranks of the Communist Party itself.
The incident was followed by another outbreak of terror and by repeated "purges" of the party and the administration. In several spectacular trials many of the most prominent of the older communist leaders were condemned.

1935, Jan. 15-17. Zinoviev, Kamenev, and several other leaders were tried for treason and conspiracy. They were convicted and imprisoned for terms of 5 to 10 years.

May 2. CONCLUSION OF THE FRANCO-RUSSIAN ALLIANCE.

This was carefully fitted into the framework of the League of Nations, but in Germany was regarded as a pact directed against the Nazi régime.

May 16. An alliance between Russia and Czechoslovakia obliged the Russians to come to the assistance of Czechoslovakia in the event of attack, provided France decided to act. This agreement enraged the Germans all the more, and they repeatedly accused the Czechs of having made their country a base for Russian air operations against Germany.

July 25-Aug. 20. At a meeting of the Third International it was decided that Soviet Russia, in view of the growing tension between the democratic and fascist states, should throw its weight on the side of the democracies against the common enemy. Henceforth communists in other countries were to give up their opposition to military appropriations and to support the governments, even though these were bourgeois.

1936, Aug. 19-23. Zinoviev, Kamenev, and a group of their followers were put on trial again, this time as Trotskyists, accused of plotting with enemy powers against the existing régime in Russia. They openly confessed to most of the charges brought against them, much to the astonishment of the world. On conviction, sixteen of them were at once executed.

July. On the outbreak of the civil war in Spain (p. 983) the Russian government at once took the side of the Madrid government. While Italy and Germany supported Franco, Soviet Russia sent airplanes and other supplies to the Loyalists. This only served to enhance the 1036 EUROPE division of Europe. In his Nürnberg speech (Sept.) Hitler denounced Bolshevism in the most violent fashion and made but little secret of German hopes of securing Russian territory. The position of Russia became extremely exposed when Nov. 25 Germany and Japan concluded a pact directed against communism. All these events drove Russia farther and farther in the direction of the democratic states, a policy which was reflected in

5. ADOPTION OF A NEW "DEMOCRATIC" CONSTITU-Dec. 5. TION for Russia. The Soviet Federation was recast and the Union thenceforth was composed as follows: (1) Russia; (2) Ukraine; (3) White Russia; (4) Azerbaijan; (5) Georgia; (6) Armenia; (7) Turkmenia; (8) Uzbekistan; (9) Tadzhikstan; (10) Kazakhstan; (11) Kirghistan. Russia and subsequently all other states of the Union adopted an electoral system from which no elements in the country were any longer debarred, all votes were to be equal; elections to the higher assemblies were made direct; votes were to be cast on a territorial, not on an occupational basis; the secret ballot was introduced. The place of the congresses of soviets was taken by a twochamber parliament (the Supreme Soviet), consisting of a Council of Nationalities (i.e. a federal chamber) and a Union Council. This parliament was to appoint a Presidium to act while the Council itself was not in session. All civic rights were guaranteed, but the Communist Party continued to be the only political group permitted in the country.

1937, Jan. 23-30. Piatakov, Radek, and other leaders were put on trial and convicted, thirteen of them suffering the death penalty. The various "purges" continued throughout the year and extended through the entire administration, ultimately reaching also the army and the diplomatic service. Political commissioners were appointed to watch over the army commands. May 31 Marshal Gamarnik was reported to have committed suicide,

June 12. Marshal Tukhachevski and seven other generals of the highest rank were executed after a secret courtmartial. They were accused of conspiracy with the Germans and the Japanese. There followed further purging, in the course of which all "Trotskyists" and others objectionable to Stalin were "liquidated." These executions and drastic persecutions made a miserable impression throughout the world and did much to discredit Russia as a reliable factor in international relations.

Dec. 12. The first elections under the new constitution were held. Most of the candidates elected were those of the Communist slate, so that no significant change resulted from the new system. The Supreme Soviet met for the first time Jan. 12, 1938, and appointed to the key positions those who were already dominant in the government.

1938, Mar. 2-15. Bukharin, Rykov, Yagoda, and other prominent Bolsheviks were put on trial, accused of wanting to restore bourgeois capitalism and of joining with Trotsky in treasonable conspiracy. They were convicted and executed. More and more Stalin trusted to the younger generation, which had never known anything but the Bolshevik régime and which was therefore less apt to criticize.

July 11-Aug. 10. Open warfare broke out between the Russians and the Japanese on the frontier of castern Siberia and Manchukuo. The Russians held their own and the matter was finally compromised, but Russian-Japanese tension remained near the breaking point. During the Japanese invasion of China (p. 1121) the Russians gave firm support to the Chinese in every practicable way. Meanwhile there was no relaxation of the tension in Europe. During the Great Czech crisis the Russian Sept. government favored resistance to the German demands and publicly announced its readiness to come to the assistance of the Czechs if France did so. But neither England nor France appeared to relish the idea of communist support and followed a policy of yielding. As a result the Franco-Russian Alliance lost most of its significance and Russia was almost completely isolated in Europe. Indeed, the supposed German designs on the Ukraine seemed to presage a conflict between Germany and Russia in the not too distant future.

1939, Mar.-June. The extinction of Czechoslovakia and the German annexation of Memel threw Europe into consternation and produced a revolution in British policy (p. 971). The London government extended guarantees to Poland, Rumania and Greece and suddenly opened negotiations to bring Russia into a "peace front" directed against attack upon Poland or Rumania. The Russians, however, proved recalcitrant. They insisted not only on a complete offensive alliance, but upon guarantees for the Baltic States. After weeks of proposals and counterproposals missar for foreign affairs, after 18 years of service. Premier Vyacheslav Molotov took his place and publicly uttered sharp criticism of the British suggestions. As a result it was feared on some sides that Russia was preparing to revive close relations with Germany. In any event, Russia had suddenly emerged as a key power in international alignments.

Negotiations with England and France dragged on through the summer, the Russians rejecting one draft after another and making no secret of their distrust of the western powers. They insisted on guarantees to the Baltic States against internal revolution and also on the right to send troops into Poland in the event of aggression by Germany. The vigorous opposition of the parties concerned made it impossible for England and France to concede these points, though they sent military missions to Moscow to demonstrate their sincerity. Finally the real Russian policy was revealed when on Aug. 20, 21. A trade pact was concluded with Germany and announcement was made of a forthcoming non-aggression pact (concluded Aug. 23). The seemingly impossible had happened, and the Nazi and Communist régimes, supposedly implacable enemies, joined hands in a diplomatic revolution that shook the world. When Germany made war on Poland (p. 967) Bolshevik Russia stood by as a benevolent neutral.

13. POLAND

During the First World War Poland was a pawn in the conflict between Russia and the Central Powers. On the one hand the Russian government, to hold the loyalty of the Poles, 1914, Aug. 14. Promised that Poland should be restored as an autonomous kingdom. This policy secured the support of an important faction of Polish nationalists, led by Roman Dmowski, who Nov. 25 formed the Polish National Committee at Warsaw, which looked to Russia for solution of the Polish problem. On the other hand.

Aug. 16. Gen. Joseph Pilsudski (1867-1935, a Russian Pole by birth and several times convicted and imprisoned in Russia for radical, revolutionary activity) founded the Supreme National Committee at Cracow, under Austrian protection. The Austrian government permitted the formation of Polish legions to fight against In the course of 1915 most of Russia. Poland was conquered by the Germans and Austrians, who for a time divided the administration of the territory between them. Ultimately, however, the German high command took almost complete control of the country.

1916, July 25. Pilsudski resigned from his command in protest against the failure of the Central Powers to establish a Polish kingdom. The Polish legions were incorporated with the Austro-Hungarian army.

Nov. 5. The German and Austrian governments joined in the proclamation of an "independent" Polish kingdom and set up a Council of State, which adopted a constitution (Jan. 30, 1917). On this council Pilsudski accepted a seat.

1917, Mar. 30. The Russian provisional government declared in favor of an independent Poland, to include all lands in which the Poles comprised a majority of the population.

July 2. Pilsudski resigned from the Council of State in protest against the continued German control and domination of the government. He was thereupon arrested and imprisoned at Magdeburg (until Nov. 2, 1918).

Aug. 15. Dmowski established the Polish National Committee at Paris, the French government having given permission (June 4) for the formation of a Polish army in France.

Oct. 15. The Germans set up a Regency Council in Poland which exercised effective control under German supervision. On the collapse of the Central Powers in 1918, Oct. 12. The Regency Council took charge of affairs. But the Ukrainians had already begun the invasion of Galicia and before long

Nov. 1. Poland made war on the Ukraine, reconquering Galicia for the new Polish state.

Nov. 3. THE POLISH REPUBLIC WAS PROCLAIMED at Warsaw.

This soon fell under the control of Pilsudski, who returned from his German captivity Nov. 10 and was granted full military power by the Regency Council, which thereupon resigned (Nov. 14). Under Pilsudski's direction the Poles continued their advance in Galicia, taking Lemberg (Nov. 23). At the same time they attempted to realize their aspirations in the west, and ceeded in reaching agreements with other provisional governments (that of Daszynski at Cracow and above all that of Dmowski and Ignace Jan Paderewski at Paris), so that 1919, Jan. 17. Paderewski could form a coalition cabinet, Pilsudski acting as provisional president. A constituent assembly was elected (Jan. 26) and worked out a temporary constitutional system. In the meanwhile the entire effort of the government was devoted to the conquest of the territories belonging to Poland at the time of the first partition of 1772. This brought the Poles into conflict with the Bolsheviks in White Russia and Lithuania. Jan. 5 the Bolsheviks took Vilna. In the west there was desultory fighting with the new Czechoslovak state over the Duchy of Teschen and other disputed territories. Having concluded an armistice with the Czechs (Feb. 5), Pilsudski was able to devote himself to the southern and eastern fronts.

Apr. 19. The Poles recaptured Vilna from the Bolsheviks and advanced into White Russia. At the same time they held their own against the Ukrainians and against the Czechs. In the meanwhile the

June 28. TREATY OF VERSAILLES established the Polish frontier in the west, Poland receiving a corridor along the Vistula to the sea (the city of Danzig to be a free city under supervision of the League of Nations, but economically connected with Poland), and large parts of West Prussia and Posen. A plebiscite was to determine the frontier in Upper Silesia.
Poland was obliged to accept a minority treaty guaranteeing full rights and numerous religious, educational, linguistic, and other privileges to the minority peoples.

Aug. 18. A Polish rising was engineered in the Upper Silesian region, as a result of which the Poles secured control of much of the disputed area. In view of continued clashes in Teschen also,

Sept. 27. The Supreme Council arranged for a plebiscite in Teschen.

Dec. 7. Paderewski resigned as premier.
Pilsudski, now Marshal of Poland, remained as chief of the state.

Dec. 8. The Supreme Council laid down the so-called "Curzon Line" for Poland's eastern frontier. This line deprived Poland of Vilna and was thoroughly unsatisfactory to the Poles for this reason.

1920, Mar. 27. The Poles demanded of the Russians the boundaries of 1772 with a plebiscite in the region west of that boundary. This the Bolsheviks would not accept, though they made many efforts to effect a compromise. Breakdown of negotiations led to

Apr. 25-Oct. 12. THE RUSSIAN-POLISH WAR (p. 1033), as a result of which the Poles, with French support, secured not all, but a substantial part of their claims in the east (Treaty of Riga, Mar. 18, 1921).

July 11. The plebiscites held in Allenstein and Marienwerder showed an overwhelming vote in favor of Germany, so that these districts were lost to Poland.

Aug. 24. The Lithuanians seized Vilna after its evacuation by the Bolsheviks, but

Oct. 9. Gen. Lucien Zeligowski, with a body of Polish freebooters, captured the city and held it for Poland, with the secret approval of Pilsudski. The Polish government agreed, however, to the holding of a plebiscite.

1921, Feb. 19. Conclusion of the Polish Alliance with France, followed shortly by a similar

Mar. 3. Alliance with Rumania. For many years Polish foreign policy was based on these agreements (supplemented with less extensive pacts with Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia as well as with the Baltic states). Poland had a hostile Germany and a hostile Russia on its frontiers and for that reason was bound to France and the French system. The French supplied large sums of money for armaments and for reconstruction of the country.

Mar. 17. ADOPTION OF THE CON-STITUTION, which provided for a president, elected for seven years by a two-chamber parliament (Senate and Sejm) chosen by popular vote. The whole system was molded closely on that of France.

Mar. 20. The plebiscite in Upper Silesia resulted in a victory for the Germans, but May 4. The Poles under Adalbert Korfanty occupied some of the disputed areas. The matter was referred to the League of Nations, which finally decided, on the plea of economic necessity, to partition the region (Oct. 12).

1922, Jan. 8. The Vilna plebiscite showed a majority in favor of Poland, and the city and district were incorporated Apr. 18. The result was a bitter feud with Lithuania. Nevertheless the Conference of Ambassadors (Mar. 15, 1923) determined the Polish-Lithuanian frontier in such a way as to leave Vilna to Poland. State of war between the two states continued until Dec. 10, 1927.

- Mar. 17. Poland concluded treaties with Latvia, Estonia, and Finland which provided for maintenance of the treaty settlements and neutrality in case one of these powers should be attacked.
- Nov. 5. The elections resulted in a victory of the Rightist parties. Pilsudski resigned as chief of state and became chief of the army staff. The parliament elected
- Dec. 9. Gabriel Narutowicz president, but he was assassinated Dec. 18 and

Dec. 20. STANISLAS WOJCIECHOW-SKI became president.

The next few years were devoted to the work of reconstruction. The finances were in bad condition, the parliamentary system was distinguished by bitter party strife between the more conservative and nationalist parties and the socialists and peasants. At the same time there was much friction with the minorities (especially the Ukrainians and the Germans). Cabinets changed with the greatest suddenness and rapidity until

- 1923, Dec. 19. L. Grabski formed a nonparliamentary ministry of experts, which managed to stabilize the currency, made some concessions to meet the demands of the minorities (including Jews), and regulated Polish relations with some of the neighboring states. On Grabski's downfall (Nov. 13, 1925) there followed another period of political confusion, during
- 1925, Dec. 28. An important land law was passed, providing for the distribution of about 500,000 acres of land to the peasants annually for 10 years.
- 1926, May 10. Vincent Witos, the leader of the Peasant Party, formed a government, but

May 12-14. PILSUDSKI LED A MILITARY REVOLT against the government and the existing political system. After two days of fighting Pilsudski took the capital, forcing Witos to resign. President Wojciechowski also resigned (May 15), whereupon Pilsudski was elected to take his place. Pilsudski declined the honor, but his friend

June 1. IGNACE MOSCICKI became president. Pilsudski was the real ruler of the country, though he acted through the president, who, by

- Aug. 5. A revision of the constitution, was given much greater power.
- Oct. 2. Pilsudski assumed the premiership, which he retained until June 27, 1928. His coup and practical dictatorship had aroused great resentment and opposition among the parties of the Left, and no one less than Pilsudski could succeed in breaking the power of the opposition in the Sejm. Under Pilsudski the government resorted to the most drastic methods of repression. The Sejm was dissolved and 54 opposition deputies arrested (Nov. 28, 1927), but new elections indicated the continuance of strong objection to the rule of the military (rule of the "colonels").
- 1930, Aug. 25. Pilsudski again took over the premiership (until Nov. 28) in order to break down the Leftist opposition. Many of the radical leaders were tried and imprisoned (including Witos), and finally
- Nov. 16. The elections returned a majority of deputies supporting the government bloc. Pilsudski's control was complete, but the country began to suffer severely from the world depression, and the unrest attending general want produced an ever greater tendency on the part of the ruling group to turn to more conservative policies.
- 1932, Mar. Parliament granted the president decree powers for a period of 3 years, and these were later extended.
- 1933, May 8. Moscicki was re-elected for a second term of 7 years.
- Sept. 18. An agreement with the city government of Danzig (which had recently fallen under National Socialist control) assured the Poles in Danzig fair treatment, while guaranteeing to Danzig a certain percentage of Poland's seaborne trade. By this time the new Polish port of Gdynia (constructed after 1920 because of the constant friction between Poland and Danzig) had already outstripped its older German neighbor as a trade center.
- 1934, Jan. 26. Conclusion of a ro-year NON-AGGRESSION PACT WITH GERMANY, which gave Poland at least some assurance against a Nazi attempt to recover the Polish corridor by force of arms. The agreement reflected the changed situation resulting from the Nazi victory in Germany. The Poles, guided by the foreign minister, Col. Joseph Beck, now began to balance between the alliance with France and friendship with Germany, the great objective being to avoid involvement in the quarrels of others. In keeping with this policy

May 5. The Poles extended to 10 years a non-aggression pact with Russia which had been first concluded July 25, 1932.

1935, Apr. 23. A NEW CONSTITUTION was adopted after years of planning and discussion. The new régime, railroaded through the Sejm while the opposition stayed away, brought to an end the democratic, parliamentary system. Senate henceforth was to be one-third appointed by the president and two-thirds elected by persons of special distinction. The Sejm was reduced in numbers by more than one-half. In future it was to be composed of deputies nominated by local councils and corporate bodies. Its powers were greatly curtailed, all real authority going to the president, who was even empowered to nominate his successor. The system was not fully Fascist or National Socialist, but represented a form of authoritarianism often spoken of as "conducted democracy."

May 12. Death of Marshal Pilsudski. He was succeeded as head of the army by Gen. (later Marshal Edward Smigly-Rydz, the new power behind the presidential system.

Sept. 8. The elections, in which only 45% of the electorate took part, produced a Sejm dominated by the deputies of the government bloc. But even with complete control of the political machinery the army and its supporters were constantly challenged by their opponents. The Socialists and Peasant Party persisted in demanding a return to genuine democracy. The Ukrainians became bolder and bolder in their claims for autonomy or independence.

the Camp of National Unity, intended to be an all-inclusive union of those supporting the government. Its program called for maintenance of the constitution of 1935, popular support for the army as the shield of national existence, anti-communism, distribution of land to the peasants, Polonization of minorities, etc. In reply to this move the workers and peasants in the same month joined in a Workers', Peasants', and Intellectuals' Group, opposed to Koc and his camp. Peasant strikes became widespread and led to some bloodshed.

1938, Jan. 11. Col. Koc resigned leadership of the camp to Gen. Stanislas Skwarczynski, who represented a somewhat more moderate and conciliatory wing of the government group. Apr. 21 the camp broke definitely with the Union of Young Poland, an out-and-out fascist and violently anti-Semitic organization founded by Koc. Nevertheless the extremists on the Right, authors of anti-Semitic excesses, were as much an active danger to the government as were the radical and minority leaders on the Left.

Mar. 16-19. The Polish government, taking advantage of the international situation created by the German annexation of Austria, sent an ultimatum to Lithuania demanding an end to hostility and an early regulation of relations between the two countries. Despite years of negotiations no progress had been made toward settlement of the old feud. Now the Lithuanian government, faced by the threat of war, capitulated at once and accepted all Polish demands. A POLISH NOTE was sent Sept. 29. to Czechoslovakia demanding the cession of the Teschen area (seized by the Czechs during the Polish-Russian War of The Czechs, face to face with the threat of German invasion and deserted by their friends, were obliged to yield. Oct. 2 Polish forces occupied Teschen. Thus Poland acquired some 400 square miles of territory. In the discussions following the Munich Agreement (p. 1012) the Poles ardently championed the Hungarian claims in Slovakia and Ruthenia and tried hard to secure a common frontier with Hungary, but these schemes were frustrated by the opposition of Germany. In the same way the efforts of Col. Beck to induce the Rumanians to participate in a division of Ruthenia (Carpatho-Ukraine) between Poland, Hungary, and Rumania ended in failure. The Poles felt directly menaced by the supposed German designs on the Ukraine. They, therefore, began to revive their relations with Russia and with the Baltic states. When the Italian foreign minister, Count Ciano, visited Poland at the end of Feb. 1939 he was given an enthusiastic reception, in the course of which there was much popular demonstration against the Germans. Poland, suffering like Italy from pressure of population, had begun to put forward claims to some share in the reparation of the world's colonies to which the "have-not" powers had devoted themselves ensued after the German action in Czechoslovakia and the annexation of Memel (p. 966). At the end of March the German government submitted extensive demands to Warsaw, including the cession of Danzig to Germany and the right to construct an extra-territorial railway and automobile highway across Pomorze (the "corridor"), in return for a guarantee of Polish frontiers and a non-aggression pact-

The demands were rejected, but resulted directly in the

Mar. 31. Anglo-French guarantee of aid to Poland in the event of aggression (expanded Apr. 6 into a mutual pact of assistance "in the event of any threat, direct or indirect, to the independence of either").

In reply

Apr. 28. Hitler denounced the agreement of 1934 with Poland. Relations continued to be tense, with much friction in Danzig. In view of this situation the Poles gave up opposition to a proposed guaranty by Russia and approved the British efforts to bring the Soviet government into the new "peace front."

The Danzig problem developed rapidly during the summer and frontier incidents became frequent. The Germans began to send troops into Danzig and the Poles began to take counter measures, while reiterating their determination to oppose by force any effort to change the status quo by force. Finally the crisis broke on Aug. 20 (p. 966). The British and French stood by Poland while the Germans refused to engage in direct negotiations. Two weeks of tension ended with

Sept. 1. THE GERMAN ATTACK
ON POLAND, followed by the European War (p. 967).

14. THE BALTIC STATES

a. GENERAL

The development of the three Baltic states after the First World War was more or less along a common line. All of these states were originally part of Russia; they were, during the war, occupied by the Germans, who ruled the three countries through puppet régimes; after Germany's collapse, efforts were made by the Bolsheviks to recover these territories, which gave access to the Baltic. Through German and Allied aid, and by their own efforts, the Baltic forces drove out the Bolsheviks and established independent governments. In all three states there was a German minority of landed wealth and influence, against which agrarian legislation, aiming at the breakup of large estates, was directed. The democratic systems set up after the war gave rise to considerable confusion, with much party wrangling between Social Democrats, Agrarians, etc. Communism was an ever-present danger, against which all the governments took vigorous measures. But after the victory of National Socialism in Germany the Baltic states hastened to improve their relations with Soviet Russia in order to present a firm front against German intervention in behalf of the German minorities, or German lust of conquest. An entente between the various states had often been discussed, but had been frustrated by Lithuania's demand for recognition of her claims to Vilna. Finally

1934, Sept. 12. THE TREATIES OF THE BALTIC ENTENTE were signed between the three states, the Vilna problem being passed over. The Baltic Pact provided for common action in defense of independence and for common action in foreign affairs, with semi-annual meetings of foreign ministers.

By 1939 all three of the Baltic states had gone over to some form of dictatorship, not from deference to the German system, but rather to forge a stronger régime for ultimate resistance to Germany.

b. LITHUANIA

After the victory of the revolution in Russia,

1917, Sept. 23. A Lithuanian conference at Vilna led to the establishment of a national council and a demand for independence from Russia. The movement was encouraged by the Germans and resulted in

1918, Feb. 16. A FORMAL DECLA-RATION OF INDEPENDENCE. The new state was at once invaded by the Bolsheviks, but by

Mar. 3. The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk
Russia was obliged to recognize Lithuanian independence. The Germans also recognized the new state (Mar. 23), which entered into alliance with Germany (May 14). Under these circumstances the Lithuanian government was obliged to elect

June 4. Duke William of Urach as king. But when German power collapsed in Nov. this election was rescinded and

Nov. 11. Augustine Voldemaras formed a national government, the first of many short-lived cabinets. The Germans were obliged to withdraw, whereupon the Bolsheviks again invaded the country and 1042 1919, Jan. 5. Took Vilna, which they lost soon afterward to the Poles (Apr. 4).

Dec. 8. The Allied Powers defined the Polish-Lithuanian boundary by the Curzon Line, which left Vilna to Lithuania.

1920, July 12. The Treaty of Moscow brought to an end the Russian-Lithuanian hostilities. The Bolsheviks, at war with Poland, hastened to recognize Lithuania and the latter's possession of Vilna, which was taken over by the Lithuanians on the evacuation by the Bolsheviks (Aug. 24).

Oct. 9. Gen. Zeligowski and his Polish freebooters seized Vilna by surprise. The Lithuanians refused to give up their claims and the League of Nations arranged for a plebiscite. Meanwhile the Lithuanian capital was fixed at Kaunas (Kovno).

1921, Sept. 22. Lithuania joined the League of Nations.

1922, Jan. 8. The Vilna plebiscite, supervised by Zeligowski and his Poles, resulted in a majority vote for union with Poland. The Lithuanians refused to accept this as a valid vote and all intercourse between Lithuania and Poland was cut off. The frontier was closed and a state of war continued until Dec. 1927. All efforts by the League to bring about a settlement were bound to fail, as neither side would yield on the Vilna issue.

Feb. 15. An important land law began the process of expropriating the large landowners and distributing the land to the peasants.

Aug. 6. Adoption of the constitution which had been worked out by a constituent assembly convoked in May, 1920. Lithuania became a democratic republic, which was recognized by the United States July 27, and by England, France, and Italy Dec. 20.

Dec. 21. Antanas Stulgenskis became president of the republic.

1923, Jan. 11. INSURRECTION IN MEMEL, engineered by Lithuanians. The city, which was predominantly German, had been under inter-Allied control since 1918. Lithuanian troops now occupied it, obliging a French garrison to withdraw. An inter-Allied commission was sent out to investigate, and thereupon

Feb. 16. The council of ambassadors decided to grant Lithuania sovereignty but to constitute Memel an autonomous region in the Lithuanian state. Lithuania accepted (Mar. 16) and the Memel Statute was signed by England, France, Italy, and Japan on May 17, 1924.

Nov. 16-17. A military coup led by Gen.
Glavatsky resulted in the overthrow of the ministry and the establishment of the conservative elements in power. This coup paved the way for another

Dec. 17. COUP D'ÉTAT OF ANTANAS SMETONA, who arrested the president and cabinet and had himself made president, with Augustine Voldemaras as premier. The constitution was suspended and the Diet dissolved, Smetona becoming virtual dictator with the support of the Nationalist Union.

1929, Sept. 19. Voldemaras was forced to resign. He was later (May, 1930) tried for high treason, exiled to a village and ultimately convicted and imprisoned for a term of 12 years (June, 1934).

1931, May 6. A treaty of friendship with Russia (first concluded in 1926) was renewed for another 5-year term. By this agreement Russia recognized the Lithuanian claims to Vilna.

Dec. 11. Smetona was re-elected for another 7-year term.

head of the Memel directorate, for alleged treasonable correspondence with Germany, ushered in a period of continued German protests and recrimination. England, France, and Italy periodically made efforts to hold Lithuania to respect for the spirit as well as the letter of the Memel Statute, but with little success. After the advent of Hitler to power in Germany, relations between Germany and Lithuania were strained to the breaking point.

Dec. 16. The Nationalist Union, supporting Smetona, frankly adopted a fascist (of course not German fascist) program.

1934, June 6-7. Followers of Voldemaras attempted a coup, which failed.

Sept. 12. CONCLUSION OF THE BALTIC PACT (see above).

1935, Mar. 25. Conviction of almost 100

Memellanders on a charge of plotting the return of Memel to Germany. Those condemned to death had the sentences commuted and ultimately many were pardoned, but this episode brought the German-Lithuanian conflict to a head. Despite a change in the Memel electoral law, the elections of Sept. 29 returned 24 German members to the directorate as against 5 Lithuanians.

1936, Feb. 6. The government suppressed all political parties excepting the Nationalist Union. June 9-10. Elections were held for a new parliament along fascist lines. Only Nationalist candidates were presented, and these were elected by local authorities. The parliament met Sept. 1.

The Polish government 1938, Mar. 16. sent a stiff ultimatum to Lithuania demanding reopening of the frontier and regulation of relations. After a short crisis the Lithuanian government yielded (Mar. 19) and in the subsequent month most of the questions outstanding since the end of the World War were disposed of.

Dec. 11. The elections in Memel brought a vote of more than 90% for the National Socialists. In view of the resurgent power of Germany, the Lithuanian government was obliged to leave the Nazis practically a free hand in Memel.

1939, Mar. 23. The Germans took Memel after extorting an agreement from Lithuania. In return the Germans gave a guaranty of Lithuanian independence and integrity and concluded a commercial treaty establishing close economic relations.

Mar. 28. Gen. Jonas Cerníus, the chief of the general staff, formed a new National Coalition cabinet in which the forbidden opposition parties were represented. On Apr. 8 Cernius resigned so that the government might not have a military character. Lithuania, practically at Germany's mercy, made efforts to draw closer to Poland, the old enemy.

LATVIA

Courland (i.e. Latvia) 1917, Sept. 21. proclaimed its independence of Russia, but the Russian government refused to acknowledge the separation and the Bolsheviks, after their advent to power in Nov., began the reconquest of the country. The Letts appealed to Germany for aid and by 1918, Mar. 3. The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk the Bolsheviks were obliged to accept the loss of Courland. The Germans were in occupation of the country and

Mar. 15. Proclaimed a protectorate over "independent" Courland. After the defeat of Germany, the Letts at once proclaimed

Nov. 11. THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A LATVIAN REPUBLIC, but this led only to another

Invasion by the Bolsheviks, 1919, Jan. who took Riga (Jan. 4) and set up a Soviet government. With the consent and approval of the Allied Powers, the Germans once again undertook the expulsion of the Reds. Gen. von der Goltz recovered Libau (Apr. 16) and finally Riga (May 20), but he suffered severe reverses in the interior, and was ultimately recalled at the insistence of the Allied Powers (Aug. 16). The Letts, having re-established a bourgeois government, finally

Aug. 11. Treaty of Riga the Bolsheviks, involved in war with Poland, finally recognized the independence of Latvia. The republic was recognized by the principal Allied Powers Jan. 26, 1021.

Sept. 17. A basic agrarian law began the process of dispossessing the large landowners (mostly German), in favor of the Latvian farmers.

1921, Sept. 22. Latvia joined the League of Nations.

1922, Feb. 15. Adoption of the constitution in final form. The elections of Oct. 8 resulted in a victory for the Social Democrats, who continued to be the dominant group.

Nov. 14. Jan Chakste became president. 1927, Apr. 8. Gustav Zemgalis, president. 1928, Jan. 14. The conservative parties for the first time formed a govern-

1934, May 15. COUP D'ETAT OF KAR-LIS ULMANIS, the prime minister, assisted by Gen. Balodis. Ulmanis claimed to have anticipated a coup by the Marxists. His success represented a victory for the growing conservative elements. Martial law was proclaimed and many of the Socialist leaders were arrested. constitution was suspended and Ulmanis became virtual dictator.

Sept. 12. Latvia joined the Baltic Pact with Lithuania and Estonia (above).

1936, Apr. 11. Ulmanis succeeded Kviesis as president.

1939, May. Latvia, directly exposed to the victorious German advance to the east, became an object of great concern to Russia. In the negotiations for an Anglo-Russian pact (p. 966) the Moscow government insisted on a guaranty of the independence of all the Baltic States, but the Latvian government, as ever suspicious of the Soviets, meanwhile accepted the German offer of a mutual non-aggression pact.

d. ESTONIA

The Estonians, taking 1917, Nov. 28. advantage of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia, proclaimed their independence, but the Soviet government at once undertook the reconquest of this strategically important area. To block the Russian advance, the Germans occupied the country (Dec.) and 1918, Feb. 24. The independence of Estonia was again proclaimed, under German protection. A provisional government was formed by Konstantin Paets, who was to play a prominent rôle throughout the entire post-war period.

Mar. 3. By the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk Russia was obliged to recognize Estonian independence.

Nov. 11. The Germans began the withdrawal from the country, following the end of the First World War. ceded complete power to Paets. But the departure of the Germans simply gave the Bolsheviks another opportunity to recover their position.

Nov. 22. The Russians began a second invasion of the country. Estonians put up a valiant resistance and were supported by a British fleet.

1919, Jan. The Bolsheviks were finally driven out and the Estonian government was able to establish its control throughout most of the Adoption of a constitution June 15. drafted by a national assembly. Estonia, like Latvia, became a democratic republic, with Reval as the capital. One of the first acts of the government was to

Oct. 10. Agrarian law which inaugurated the policy of breaking up the large estates of the (German) Baltic barons and distributing the land among the peasants.

1920, Feb. 2. The Treaty of Tartu (Dorpat) with Russia brought Estonia definitive recognition as an independent state.

1921, Sept. 22. Estonia joined the League of Nations.

1923. Nov. 1, 2. Conclusion of defensive treaties with Latvia and Lithuania which paved the way for close relations and the ultimate construction of a Baltic bloc (1934).

1924, Nov. 27. Trial of 150 communists, most of whom were convicted and imprisoned. Estonia continued to be particularly exposed to communist agitation, which finally culminated in

Dec. 1. A communist uprising, which, however, was suppressed. Fear of communism continued to be a dominant factor in Estonian politics and resulted in a steady growth of conservative, not to say fascist sentiment. The conservative elements organized in a League of Liberators (i.e. veterans of the campaigns against Soviet Russia), which succeeded in forc-

Mar. 12. KONSTANTIN PAETS, aided by Gen. John Laidoner, set up a virtual dictatorship. Parliament was prorogued, political parties were abolished, 400 leaders of the Liberators were arrested, and civil liberties were drastically curtailed. But Paets acted in behalf of the conservative and middle-class elements, and from the outset averred his intention of ultimately re-establishing constitutional government.

Sept. 12. Estonia joined in the Baltic Pact (p. 1041).

1936, Feb. 23-25. In a plebiscite, the nation voted 3 to 1 in favor of abolishing the Constitution of 1934 and returning to the democratic system. In Dec. a national assembly was convoked to work out a new constitution.

May 6. About 150 leaders of the Liberators were put on trial for attempting another coup in Dec. 1935. Only seven of them were acquitted. Paets continued to be irreconcilably opposed to fascism and national socialism, as he was to communism.

1937, July 29. The new constitution, providing for a president and a twochamber parliament, was adopted. Restoration of civil liberties was provided for, as were democratic elections. But under the new system the president (to be elected for six years) was to enjoy great authority, with power to appoint and dismiss the cabinet, dissolve both houses of parliament, and rule by decree in national emergencies.

1938, Feb. 24. The election resulted in a chamber containing 63 deputies of Paets' National Front and 17 of opposition groups.

Apr. 24. Paets was elected president.

1939, May. Estonia concluded a mutual non-aggression pact with Germany, acting together with Latvia (see above).

15. THE SCANDINAVIAN STATES

a. GENERAL

The Scandinavian states were all able to preserve neutrality during the First World War, though they were obliged to subject themselves to various regulations and restrictions made necessary by the Allied blockade of Germany. After 1918 they all took an active part in the development of collective security, in which obviously they have a great interest. For the rest they all became thoroughly democratic states, outstanding in the whole world for their progressiveness and enlightenment. In the matter of politics the situation in most cases was rather unstable, due to the relative strength of conservative, liberal, agrarian, and social democratic parties and the difficulty of establishing majority government. In the field of foreign policy efforts were made consistently to develop a program of close co-operation and solidarity, which became all the more necessary after the resurgence of Germany as a powerful military state. Efforts at collaboration go back to the 1914, Dec. 18-19. Meeting of the kings of the three Scandinavian states at Malmö. They discussed various problems of the war, neutrality, etc. Similar meetings took place periodically during the war and post-war periods, and they were supplemented by gatherings of the foreign ministers, which became increasingly frequent.

1926, Jan. 14, 15, 30. Agreements were made between Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Finland providing for the pacific settlement of all disputes. Ultimately, when these countries began to suffer severely from the world economic crisis,

1931, Sept. 6. Prime ministers of the Scandinavian states met for discussion of economic problems, and there was finally drawn up the 1932, Feb. 7. Oslo Convention, by which the Scandinavian states joined with Holland and Belgium in a scheme of economic co-operation, albeit on a modest scale. More recently Scandinavian solidarity was celebrated by the institution 1936, Oct. 27. Scandinavia's Day. In view of the collapse of the League system for security and the imposing rearmament of Germany and Russia.

1938, Apr. 5-6. The four Scandinavian foreign ministers met for a discussion of the defense problem. In view of the unwillingness of Denmark to challenge Germany, the specific question of armament and defense had to be left to the individual governments.

July 1. The Oslo mutual trade agreements came to an end. Nevertheless, relations between the socalled Oslo powers continued to be cordial and even close.

1939, May 17. Sweden, Norway and Finland declined the German offer of a mutual non-aggression pact, an offer provoked by President Roosevelt's suggestion, in his letter to Hitler, that Germany's neighbors felt threatened by aggression. The problem was discussed at length by the Scandinavian foreign ministers, most of whom agreed to hold aloof from all commitments to rival power groups. Denmark alone accepted the German offer, being unwilling to give reason for complaint.

b. DENMARK

1912- CHRISTIAN X, king.

1914, Aug. 4. Sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States. The transaction was approved by a Danish plebiscite Dec. 14.

1918, Apr. 21. The system of complete universal suffrage (male and female) went into effect. In the

Apr. 22. Elections under the new system the Conservatives secured 23 seats, the Left (Liberals) 45, the Radicals 33, and the Socialists 39. The government was formed by a coalition of Radicals and Socialists.

Nov. 30. By the Act of Union, Iceland was recognized as a sovereign state, united with Denmark only in the person of the ruler. But until 1944 certain affairs were to be handled jointly by the governments.

1920, Feb. 10, Mar. 14. By the plebiscites provided for in the Treaty of Versailles, a northern zone of Schleswig went to Denmark by popular vote. It was officially incorporated July o.

Mar. 8. Denmark joined the League of Nations.

1924, Apr. 11. In the elections the Socialists increased their representation from 39 to 55. Thereupon Theodor Stauning (Socialist) formed a government.

1926, Mar. 12. The Danish Parliament voted for almost complete disarmament, which was subsequently carried through.

Dec. 2. A Liberal government was formed by T. Madsen-Mygdal after a severe setback to the Socialists in the elections.

1929, Apr. 24. Stauning organized another government after Socialist successes at the polls. His party acted in coalition with the Radical Left.

1931, July. A serious dispute with Norway developed over the problem of sovereignty over East Greenland (see below).

1933. Agitation of the Germans in North Schleswig followed on the victory of the National Socialists in Germany. No serious trouble ensued, however, and Germany and Denmark, closely connected by economic ties, maintained friendly relations, despite the continuance in power in Denmark of the Stauning Socialist-Radical ministry. National Socialism itself made but little progress in Denmark, although Denmark, practically disarmed, remained more or less at the mercy of her powerful neighbor.

c. NORWAY

1905- HAAKON VII, king. Norway, much more dependent on trade and fishing than either Denmark or Sweden, has alone among the Scandinavian powers revealed a tendency toward expansion over-1919, Sept. 25. The Allied Supreme Council awarded Norway the sover-eignty over Spitsbergen, which was thereupon annexed (Feb. 9, 1920). Other acquisitions are mentioned below.

1920, Mar. 5. Norway joined the League of Nations.

1924, Oct. 20. In the elections the Conservatives emerged victorious, with 54 seats as against 34 for the Radicals, 22 for the Agrarians, 24 for the Labor Party, and 8 for the Socialists. But in the next for the first time became the strongest group (59 seats as against 31 for the Conservatives and 31 for the Liberals). The first labor government was organized by Christopher Hornsrud, but was soon forced out by its opponents (Feb. 10, 1928). Therupon J. L. Mowinckel (Liberal) formed a cabinet.

1928, Jan. 18. Annexation of Bouvet Island and of 1929, Feb. 2. Peter Island, both in the South Atlantic and both important as stations for whalers.

May 8. Annexation of Jan Mayen Island in the Arctic.

1929-1930. Explorations of Commander Riiser-Larsen in the Antarctic Continent (p. 576).

1931, May 8. P. Kolstad (Farmers' Party) formed a government.

July 10. Annexation of the East Greenland coast between 71° 30' and 75° 40' N.L. Norwegian fishermen had settled along the coast and there was some fear that Denmark, which claimed sovereignty, would attempt to make her control Denmark at once protested effective. against the Norwegian action and both parties agreed to refer the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice. While the case was pending the Norwegian government (July 12, 1932) proclaimed annexation also of part of the more southern coast (60° 30' to 63° 40' N.L.), but finally (Apr. 5, 1933) the Permanent Court decided against the Norwegian claims. The Oslo government accepted the decision without demur.

1932, Mar. 5. On the death of Premier Kolstad, his place was taken by J. Hundseid, but

1935, Mar. 20. A second Labor government was formed by Johan Nygaarsvold, with Halvdan Koht, an eminent historian, at the foreign office. This government was very successful in overcoming the economic crisis, and became noteworthy for its extension of social security legislation (1937, Jan.: Workers' Security Law and Seamen's Security Law).

1939, Jan. 14. Norway laid claim to 1,000,000 square miles of Antarctic territory extending from 20° W. Long. to 45° E. Long. (Coats Land to Enderby Land, about one-fifth of the entire Antarctic coast, see p. 577).

d. SWEDEN

1907- GUSTAVUS V, king.

1917, Dec. 29. The Aaland Islands, following the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, voted to join with Sweden, but later (June 25, 1921) the League of Nations Council assigned them to Finland, with the proviso that they should be demilitarized.

1919, May 26. The introduction of woman suffrage completed the democratization of the franchise.

1920, Mar. 4. Sweden joined the League of Nations.

Mar. 10. Hjalmar Branting formed the first purely Socialist cabinet, but he was forced to resign after the defeat of his party in the elections of Oct. 22.

1921, Oct. 13. Branting formed a second government, which remained in office until Apr. 6, 1923, and was followed in 1924, Oct. 18, by the third Branting government. The prime minister died Feb. 24, 1925, but his place was taken by Rickard Sandler, the cabinet continuing in power until June 1, 1926. These Socialist cabinets enacted a large body of social reform legislation for both workers and peasants, and greatly reduced the military establishment. After the downfall of the Socialist government in June, 1926, there followed a number of Liberal and Conservative governments:

1926, June 7. Carl Ekman (Liberal), premier.

1928, Oct. 2. Arvid Lindman (Conservative), premier.

1930, June 1. Ekman again assumed power, but the elections of Sept. 1932 revealed substantial gains by the Social Democrats and Farmers and 1932, Sept. 24. Per A. Hansson became premier of a Socialist government, with Rickard Sandler as foreign minister. This government did much to combat the evils of the depression by introducing large-scale public works, drastically economizing in administration, and passing a long-term unemployment insurance act (May, 1934). The government also undertook a program of rearming which appeared essential after the rise of Hitler in Germany and the rapid deterioration of German-Russian relations.

1936, June 13. Axel Pehrsson (Agrarian) formed a cabinet, but after the elections of Sept. 20 (Socialists 112 seats; Conservatives 44; Agrarians 36; Liberals 27), Sept. 28. Hansson again assumed the premierahip, his government representing a coalition of Socialists and Agrarians.

e. FINLAND

1917, Mar. 21. The Russian provisional government recognized Finland as an independent state within the proposed Russian federation, but the

July 20. FINNS PROCLAIMED THEIR COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE of Russia, and this was recognized by the Russian Soviet government (Jan. 2, 1918) as well as by Sweden (Jan. 4), France, and Germany (Jan. 6). In Finland itself there ensued a period of

1918, Jan. 28. CIVIL WAR. Finnish communists (Reds), supported by the Russian Bolsheviks, seized Helsingfors (Helsinki) and overran much of southern Finland, but in

Apr. The Whites (i.e. opponents of Bolshevism), led by Baron Karl Gustav Mannerheim and supported by a German force under Gen. von der Goltz, retook the capital (Apr. 13) and drove the Reds out of the country (battle of Viborg, Apr. 29). For a time Finland remained under strong German influence, and

Oct. 8. The Finnish Diet elected Prince Frederick Charles of Hesse as king. After the defeat of the Central Powers, Frederick Charles himself renounced the crown (Dec. 31). In the interval again, over conflicting claims to Carelia. After much desultory fighting, hostilities were concluded by the Treaty of Dorpat (Tartu) of Oct. 14, 1920, by the terms of which Finland was given a narrow strip of territory between Murmansk and the eastern frontier of Norway, with the ice-free port of Pechenga. The fate of the Finnish population in Carelia remained a source of friction between the two coun-the Aaland Islands, on condition that the islands be given an autonomous régime.

Oct. 20 the powers concluded a convention neutralizing the islands.

1922, Oct. 14. Passage of an agrarian law which inaugurated the breakup of the large estates and the distribution of the land to the peasants.

1925, Feb. 16. LAURI RELANDER succeeded Stahlberg as president.

1930, Oct. 14. Attempted coup of Gen.

Kurt Wallenius and his fascist

Lapua organization. The president of the republic was abducted, but in the end the coup failed. The whole movement was directed chiefly against communism, which, with Soviet Russia near by, was a constant factor in the Finnish situation. As a result of pressure from the Lapua group, Nov. 11. The government enacted drastic measures against communism.

1931, Feb. 16. PEHR SVINHUFVUD became president. During his term of office he threw his entire influence in the direction of conservatism, which encouraged the fascist elements to attempt 1932, Feb. 27-Mar. 7. Another Lapua uprising. Once again the movement failed. Gen. Wallenius was arrested and Nov. 21 more than 50 leaders were convicted. The organization was disbanded, but in 1933 there emerged the Patriotic National Movement, similar to the Lapuan. To meet this continued threat.

1933, May 4. The government forbade the military organization of political parties and groups, and 1934, Apr. The wearing of uniforms and political emblems was prohibited.

1935, Aug. 28. The Finnish foreign minister for the first time joined in the meeting of ministers of the other Scandinavian states. Thereafter Finland regularly participated in these meetings. In view of the changed conditions in the Baltic after Hitler's rise to power, Finland attempted to form a bloc of Scandinavian and Baltic states to hold a balance between Germany and Russia. In close collaboration with these states Finland proceeded to refortification of the Aaland Islands, despite the opposition of the inhabitants.

1937, Feb. 15. KYOSTI KALLIO, premier and leader of the Agrarian Party, was elected president, with support of the Social Democrats. A coalition government of Agrarians, Socialists, and National Progressives was formed, which was outspokenly hostile to reactionary and fascist movements and which was determined to further the close relationship with the other democratic Scandinavian states. In keeping with this policy 1938, Nov. 22. The government dissolved the Patriotic National Movement, which was the spearhead of fascism.

1939, May 17. Finland, together with Norway and Sweden, declined the German offer of a mutual non-aggression pact, but at the same time made known its opposition to the Russian suggestion of a joint Russian-British-French guarantee of the independence of all the Baltic States. Relations with Russia continued cool, the more so as the Soviet delegate blocked League approval of the refortification of the Aaland Islands.

C. NORTH AMERICA

1. THE UNITED STATES

- 1917, Apr. 6. WAR DECLARED ON GERMANY. Diplomatic relations with Austria-Hungary were terminated Apr. 8, but war was declared only Dec. 7. Diplomatic relations with Turkey were severed Apr. 20, but war was never formally declared on either Turkey or Bulgaria.
- May 18. Selective Service Act passed, providing for the registration of those between 21 and 31 years inclusive. June 5 local draft boards registered 9,586,508 men. June 5, 1918, another million (those who had come of age during the year) were added. Sept. 12, 1918, a third registration, of those between 18 and 48 years, added another 13,228,762 men.
 - June 13. First division embarked for France.
 - June 15-1918, May 6. The Espionage Act, the Trading-with-the-Enemy Act (Oct. 6, 1917) and the Sedition Act (May 6, 1918).
 - July. War Industries Board created and placed in complete charge of all war purchases.
 - Aug. 10. The Lever Act, establishing control over food and fuel. Herbert Hoover, food administrator.
 - Sept. 1. Grain Corporation inaugurated, which fixed price of grain and financed the 1917, 1918, and 1919 crops.
 - Oct. 3. War Revenue Act, greatly increasing income tax and imposing an excess profits tax on business earnings of corporations and individuals.
- Nov. 2. Lansing-Ishii Agreement, reafirming the assurances of the Root-Takahira Agreement (1908), with the admission by the United States that "territorial propinquity" gave Japan special interests in China.
 - Dec. William G. McAdoo, secretary of the treasury, made directorgeneral of the railroad administration.
- Dec. 18. Under stress of war conditions and the need of food conservation Congress had in Aug. 1917 prohibited the use of food products in the making of distilled beverages. Ownership of large numbers of breweries and distilleries by persons of German origin accentuated popular re-

- sentment against liquor traffic. As a result, Congress adopted the 18th amendment and sent it to the states for ratification. It became part of the constitution Jan. 16, 1919.
- 1918, Jan. 8. Fourteen Points set forth by President Wilson in an address to Congress defining war aims of the United States (p. 944).
 - Apr. 5. War Finance Commission created with fund of $500,000,000 for financing essential industries.
- Apr. 10. Webb-Pomerene Act exempting export associations from the restraints of the anti-trust laws, with a view to encouraging export trade.
- July 18-Nov. 11. American troops participated in six prolonged assaults upon German positions. Two of these were conducted wholly by American forces: battle of Saint Mihiel (Sept. 12-16) and that of the Meuse-Argonne (Sept. 26-Nov. 11), in which 1,200,000 men were thrown into the encounter (pp. 945, 950).
 - Nov. 11. Armistice signed (see First World War).
 - Dec. 13. Arrival of President Wilson in France, for the Peace Conference. Accompanied by Col. House, Robert Lansing, secretary of state, Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, and Henry White.
- 1919, Mar. 2. Senate Round-Robin, declaring the opinion of 39 senators that only after the establishment of peace should the League of Nations concern the negotiators.
 - June 28. Treaty of Versailles signed.
 July 10-1920, Mar. 19. Treaty of Ver-
- sailles before the Senate. When presented to the Senate July 10, strong objection developed to the treaty. Wilson refused to accept amendments or reservations. Nov. 19, the Senate defeated the treaty with and without reservations was rejected by a vote of 49 to 35. Wilson then vetoed a joint resolution of Congress declaring war with Germany at an end. A similar resolution was passed July,
 - 1921, and signed by Harding.

 Sept. 22-1920, Jan. 8. Steel strike. Although the public sympathized with the steel workers and regretted the 12-hour day, the strikers were defeated.

Oct. 28. The National Prohibition Act, commonly known as the Volstead Act, passed over President Wilson's veto in pursuance of the 18th amendment. It defined as intoxicating all beverages containing more than one-half of 1% of alcohol; provided several regulations for the manufacture and sale of alcohol for industrial, medicinal, and sacramental purposes. Strengthened by amendments of 1921 and 1920.

by President Wilson, giving the interstate commerce commission power to establish and maintain rates which would yield a "fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of the country," and power to prescribe minimum rates. Prosperous roads were to share profits with the less prosperous. The commission was empowered to draw up a plan for the consolidation of the railway lines into a limited number of systems, such combinations to be exempt from operation of the anti-trust laws.

Mar. 1. The railroads were returned to their owners.

1920, June 5-1928. Merchant Marine Acts. Under the Act of 1920 the shipping board was to dispose of the wartime merchant fleet to private parties, and to operate those ships which it could not sell; to establish new shipping routes and to keep ships in these services until private capital could be attracted to them. These measures failing to interest private capital, the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 established a revolving fund from which construction loans up to three-fourths of the costs of building were to be made to private operators, and private owners were to be given, as an inducement to shipbuilding and operation, long-term mail-carrying contracts. In effect the Act of 1928 provided for 1920, June 20. Water-Power Act passed, creating a federal power commission composed of the secretaries of war, interior, and agriculture and subordinate appointive officers. Its authority extended to all waterways on public lands, to all navigable streams, including falls and rapids. It might license power companies to utilize appropriate dam sites for periods not exceeding 50 years. The power commission applied the act so generously as to subsidies to the merchant marine.

make it largely ineffectual.

Aug. 28. Nineteenth amendment, providing for woman suffrage.

Sept. 8-11. Transcontinental air mail

York and San Francisco, 16,000 letters being carried.

Nov. 2. The Westinghouse Electrical Company arranged the first general radio broadcast for the national election. Nov. 31 the same company broadcast the first regular evening program.

Nov. 2. Warren G. Harding (Republican) elected president over James M. Cox (Democrat), 404 electoral votes to 137.

1921, Mar. 4—1923, Aug. 2. WARREN G. HARDING, twenty-ninth president

Apr. 20. Colombian Treaty ratified by the Senate; the United States was to pay Colombia $25,000,000 for the loss of Panama and to grant free access to the Panama Canal. A similar treaty, negotiated by the Wilson administration in 1914, had been rejected by the Senate, largely because of the influence of Theodore Roosevelt, who denounced it as blackmail.

May 19. Immigration Act signed, limiting the immigrants from a given country to 3% of the number of foreignborn persons of such nationality resident in the United States according to the U.S.

Census of 1010.

May 27. Emergency Tariff Act, raising duties on agricultural products, wool, and sugar. It placed an embargo on German dyestuffs; those products that could not be made in the United States were put on a licensing basis.

Aug. 24. Treaty of peace signed with Austria.

Nov. 12—1922, Feb. 6. WASHINGTON CONFERENCE. Aug. 11 President Harding issued a call to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan to meet for discussion of naval limitation, and to the same powers plus Belgium, Netherlands, Portugal, and China for discussion of questions affecting the Pacific and the Far East. For the agreements concluded see 1922, Feb. 11. By the Yap Treaty (Feb. 11) the United States secured equality with Japan and other nations in the use of cable and wireless facilities in Yap and other Japanese mandates.

Mar. 24. Four-Power Treaty ratified by the Senate.

Mar. 29. Five-Power Naval Treaty ratified.

Apr. 1-Sept. 4. Strike of coal miners in protest against wage reductions and in support of the check-off system by which the unions require employers to deduct union fees from wages. Herrin riots in Illinois. Agreement reached with bituminous miners Aug. 15 and with anthracite miners Sept. 4.

July 1-Sept. 13. Railway shopmen's strike in protest against wage reductions set by railway labor board.

Sept. 19. Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act passed. Contained highest rates in American tariff history. Ad-valorem duties were to be assessed on the foreign value of the goods. The act explicitly stated that the principle underlying American protection was to be that of equalizing the cost of American and foreign production.

Nov. 20. An American observer sent to the Lausanne Conference. This break with the administration's policy of non-interference in European affairs was largely due to the concern of American oil interests over the oil situation in the Near Eastern fields where a British monopoly was feared.

1923-1930. Refunding of debts owed the United States by Allied Powers. During and immediately following the war the United States lent to foreign powers a total of $10,350,000,000. The first refunding agreement was with Great Britain, which was to pay over a period of 62 years, with interest at 3.3%. The settlement with Italy came in Nov. 1925, with interest rate fixed at 0.4%. That with France was in Apr. 1926, with interest at 1.6%, over a period of 62 years. By May 1930 17 nations had come to terms with the United States.

Aug. 2. CALVIN COOLIDGE became thirtieth president upon death of Warren G. Harding.

1924, Jan. 14. Gen. Charles G. Dawes chosen chairman of reparation commission expert committee. Conference of London (July 16—Aug. 16) used the report as a basis of agreement (p. 959).

Teapot Dome oil scandal. Feb.-Mar. Apr. 7, 1922, Albert Fall, secretary of the interior, leased the Teapot Dome Oil Reserve to Harry F. Sinclair, and by agreements of Apr. 25 and Dec. 11, 1922, he leased the Elk Hills Reserve to E. L. Do-Secrecy attending the leases, combined with the sudden opulence of Fall, led to Senate investigation under direction of Senator Thomas J. Walsh. It was shown that Sinclair had personally befriended Fall, while Doheny had "loaned" $100,000 to Fall without security or interest. As a result, Denby, secretary of the navy, resigned (Fall had previously resigned), and in 1927 the supreme court ordered the reserves returned to the government.

May 19. Soldiers' Bonus Bill for veterans of the First World War passed over the president's veto.

May 26. Immigration Bill signed, limiting annual immigration from a given country to 2% of the nationals of the country in the United States in 1890. A further provision of the law stipulated that from July 1, 1927 (later deferred to 1929) the annual immigration should be limited to 150,000, to be apportioned among the different countries in proportion to the relative strength of the various foreign elements represented in the American population in 1920. The bill provided for the total exclusion of the Japanese, thereby abrogating the gentlemen's agreement. Protest from Japan and resulting ill feeling.

May 27. Rogers Bill signed consolidating the diplomatic and consular services.

Nov. 4. Calvin Coolidge elected president over John W. Davis (Democrat) and R. M. La Follette (Progressive) by 382 electoral votes to 136 for Davis and 13 for La Follette.

1925 Mar. 4—1929, Mar. 4. CALVIN COOLIDGE president.

1925-1929. Agricultural legislation. Feb. 1922 the Capper-Volstead Act granted to agricultural associations and co-operatives the right to process, prepare, handle, and market their goods in interstate commerce. In Mar. 1923 the Federal Intermediate Credit Act provided for the creation of a system of federal intermediate credit banks for the purpose of handling agricultural paper exclusively. Agriculture continuing in a depressed state, legislation was shortly introduced into Congress with a view to its rehabilitation. The McNary-Haugen Bill, a measure designed to make the tariff on agricultural products effective, was defeated in the House in June 1924 and again in May 1926. In June 1926 it was defeated in the Senate, but in Feb. 1927 it passed both houses, only to be vetoed by Coolidge. In Apr. and May 1928 it again passed both houses but was again vetoed by the president. This measure, as well as the export debenture plan, was opposed largely because of price-fixing and subsidy features. In June 1929 the Agricultural Marketing Act of the Hoover administration was enacted with its plan for the redemption of agriculture through voluntary co-operation and self-discipline under governmental auspices. Producers were to be encouraged to form effective marketing corporations, owned and controlled by themselves. A federal farm board was created with a revolving fund of $500,000,000 for loans to co-operatives and with power to create stabilization corporations. Grain and cotton stabilization corporations bought extensively with a view to sustaining prices of farm products, but to little avail.

the Calles government in Mexico with failure to protect American lives and property rights, creating a tension between the two countries which was increased by the enactment of the Mexican Petroleum Law and the Alien Land Law in Dec. 1925.

See p. 1075.

May 20-21. Charles A. Lindbergh made the first non-stop New York to Paris flight, alone in the monoplane Spirit of St. Louis. His time was 33 hrs. 39 min.

1927, Oct. Dwight W. Morrow appointed ambassador to Mexico. By his tact and understanding he gained the confidence of Mexico, which was expressed by concessions on controverted points.

Dec. The amendment of the Mexican Petroleum Law paved the way for a marked improvement in the relations between the two countries. Morrow also played the rôle of conciliator in the controversy between the government and the Catholic Church in Mexico.

1928, Aug. 27. The Pact of Paris signed.
Art. I outlawed war as an instrument of national policy, while Art.
II committed the contracting parties to settle all disputes by pacific means (p. 960).

Nov. Herbert Hoover (Republican) elected president over Alfred E. Smith (Democrat) by 444 electoral votes to 87.

1929, Jan. 15. Pact of Paris ratified by the Senate, with the declaration that it did not curtail the country's right of self-defense; that the treaty was not inconsistent with the Monroe Doctrine; and that it did not commit the United States to engage in punitive expeditions against aggressor states.

1929, Mar. 4—1933, Mar. 4. HERBERT HOOVER, thirty-first president.

1929, Oct. STOCK MARKET CRASH, the culmination of the boom market and unrestrained speculation of the Coolidge-Hoover era. Ushered in prolonged depression which gradually settled upon the country with increasing unemployment, bank failures, and business disasters.

1930, Jan. 21-Apr. 22. London Naval Conference, resulting in a three-power treaty by the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. It established a permanent parity between Great Britain and the United States; continued capital ship construction holiday to the end of 1936. It set up an American-Japanese ratio of capital ships which was unsatisfactory to Japan, and fixed limits to building of auxiliary craft within a system of ratios.

CLARK MEMORANDUM ON THE MONROE DOCTRINE made public by the state department. Written by J. Reuben Clark, undersecretary of state two years before, the Memorandum declared: 1. The Monroe Doctrine is unilateral. 2. "The Doctrine does not concern itself with purely inter-American relations." 3. "The Doctrine states a case of the United States versus Europe, not of the United States versus Latin America." 4. The United States has always used the Doctrine to protect Latin-American nations from the aggressions of European powers. 5. The Roosevelt corollary is not properly a part of the Doctrine itself, nor does it grow out of the Doctrine.

June 17. Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act signed by Hoover in spite of protest of more than 1000 trained economists. Duties higher than ever. In many instances the duties on raw material were 50 to 100% greater than in 1922 schedules. This led to widespread reprisals and retaliation by other countries. By the end of 1931 some 25 countries had taken steps to retaliate.

July 21. London Naval Treaty ratified by the Senate.

torium. In 1929 a committee of experts under the chairmanship of Owen D. Young had submitted the Young Plan to Germany, in which debts and reparations were joined together, despite the refusal of the American state and treasury departments to admit the fact. By June 1931 it was evident that the German financial situation would preclude payments for the year, whereupon Hoover, accepting the inevitable, arranged a year's moratorium on debts and reparations.

by the secretary of state. Stimson, in notes to Japan and China, in which he stated that the United States would not "recognize any situation, treaty, or agreement which may be brought about by means contrary to the covenants and obligations of the Pact of Paris." This was in protest against Japanese occupation of Manchuria.

Feb. 2. Reconstruction Finance Corporation created with a fund of $500,000,000 and the right to borrow more money, for the purpose of making available government credits to release the frozen assets of financial institutions and to provide aid for the railways.

Feb. Norris Anti-Injunction Act, declaring "yellow-dog" contracts unenforcible before the federal courts and providing that certain types of activity in labor conflicts should be immune from injunctions. It provided that "no person participating in, or affected by, such disputes shall be enjoined from striking, or from striving for the success of the strike by customary labor-union effort, short of fraud or violence." The immunity extended to all persons "in the same industry, trade, or occupation" rather than merely to employers and their own employees.

Nov. Franklin D. Roosevelt (Democrat) elected president over Herbert Hoover (Republican) by 472 electoral votes to 59.

Dec. 15. Default of various European governments in payment of war debts owed to the United States.

1933, Feb. 6. Twentieth amendment to the constitution proclaimed. It provided that after Oct. 15, 1933, senators and representatives should take office Jan. 3 following the election and that Congress should convene annually on that date. The president and vice-president were to take office Jan. 20, after election.

Feb. 14. Closing of all banks in the state of Michigan gave warning of an impending banking crisis. Bank holidays spread from state to state until the climax was reached on the night of Mar. 3.

Mar. 4. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, thirty-second president. Banks closed and business virtually at a standstill.

Mar. 6. Banks closed for four days by proclamation of the president and an embargo placed on the export of gold in order to protect the gold reserve.

Mar. 9. Congress convened in special session, legalized the president's action with respect to banks and authorized the comptroller of the currency to take charge of insolvent banks. Within a week after the president's proclamation the sound banks began to reopen.

1933-1936. NEW DEAL AGRICUL-TURAL LEGISLATION: May

12, 1933, the Agricultural Adjustment Act became law. Its aim was the establishment of that parity for farm products which had existed in the period 1909–1914. This was to be achieved through removal of the agricultural surplus by means of compensated crop curtailment, financed through the licensing and taxing of the processors of farm products. Provision was also made for the refinancing of farm mortgages.

The Farm Credit Act (approved June 16, 1933) authorized the Farm Credit Administration to centralize "all agricultural credit activities."

The Farm Mortgage Refinancing Act (approved Jan. 31, 1934) created the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to aid further in the refinancing of farm debts and guaranteed both as to principal and interest federal bonds exchanged for consolidated farm loan bonds.

The Farm Mortgage Foreclosure Act (approved June 12, 1934) extended the lending authority of the land bank commissioner to permit him to make loans to farmers for the purpose of enabling them to redeem farm properties owned by them previous to foreclosure regardless of when foreclosure took place.

Frazier-Lemke Farm Bankruptcy Act (approved June 28, 1934) facilitated agreements between distressed farmers and their creditors and granted extension of time to farmers during which they might remain in possession of their farms.

The Crop Loan Act (approved Feb. 23, 1934) permitted the Farm Credit Administration to make loans to farmers in 1934 for crop production and harvesting.

The Cotton Control Act (approved April 21, 1934) placed the production of cotton on a compulsory rather than a voluntary basis

Jones-Costigan Sugar Act (approved May 9, 1934) included among the basic crops of the original Agricultural Adjustment Act sugar beets and sugar cane.

Tobacco Control Act (approved June 28, 1934) placed the production of tobacco on a compulsory basis.

The Frazier-Lemke Farm Bankruptcy Act was subsequently declared unconstitutional, while Jan. 6, 1936, the Agricultural Adjustment Act met a similar fate. The objective of the latter act was then achieved by the Soil Conservation Act by which farmers were paid for planting soil-conserving crops in lieu of the ordinary staples.

1933-1984. NEW DEAL BANKING LEGISLATION: The Emergency

Banking Relief Act (approved Mar. 9, 1933) gave the president power to regulate transactions in credit, currency, gold and silver, and foreign exchange. It also authorized the secretary of the treasury to require the delivery of all gold and gold certificates; provided for the appointment of conservators of national banks in difficulties.

The Banking Act of 1933 (approved June 16, 1933) extended federal reserve openmarket activities; created the Federal Bank Deposit Insurance Corporation to insure deposits; regulated further the operations of member banks and separated security affiliates.

The Bank Deposit Insurance Act (approved June 19, 1934) amended deposit features of the Banking Act and raised the amount eligible for insurance of each depositor to $5000.

1933-1934. NEW DEAL HOME FI-NANCING: The Home Owners' Refinancing Act (approved June 13, 1933) created the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to refinance home mortgages.

The Home Owners' Loan Act (approved Apr. 27, 1934) guaranteed the principal of the HOLC's bond issues and permitted loans for repair of dwellings.

1933-1934. NEW DEAL MONETARY
LEGISLATION: The Gold Repeal Joint Resolution (approved June 5, 1933) cancelled the gold clause in all federal and private obligations and made them payable in legal tender.

The Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (approved Jan. 30, 1934) authorized the president to revalue the dollar at 50 to 60 cents in terms of its gold content; set up a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund.

The Silver Purchase Act (approved June 19, 1934) authorized the president to nationalize silver.

1933-1935. NEW DEAL RELIEF LEGIS-LATION: The Federal Emergency Relief Act (approved May 12, 1933) authorized the RFC to make $500,000,000 available for emergency relief to be expended by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration created by the act.

The Civil-Works Emergency Relief Act (approved Feb. 15, 1934) appropriated an additional $950,000,000 available until June 30, 1935, for continuation of the civil-works program and for direct relief purposes under the FERA.

The Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of Apr. 8, 1935, was designed to provide relief and work relief and to increase employment by providing for useful projects; it appropriated $4,000,000,000 to be used nominally at the president's discretion. It further appropriated unexpended balances of several earlier appropriations aggregating about $880,000,000.

1933-1934. NEW DEAL SECURITIES
LEGISLATION: The Securities
Act of 1933 (approved May 27, 1933) provided for filing with the federal trade commission and for transmission to prospective investors of the fullest possible information, accompanied by sworn statements, about merce or through the mails.

The Securities Exchange Act (approved June 6, 1934) provided for the regulation of securities exchanges and established a securities and exchange commission.

1933-1935. NEW DEAL LABOR LEGIS-LATION: The Labor Disputes Joint Resolution (approved June 19, 1934) abolished the national labor board and created allederal agency for the investigation and mediation of labor disputes growing out of the National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA).

The Railway Pension Act (approved June 27, 1934) provided a comprehensive retirement system for railway employees based on employer and employee contributions. This act was subsequently declared unconstitutional.

The Crosser-Dill Railway Labor Act (approved June 27, 1934) provided for the settlement of labor disputes on the railroads and outlawed company unions.

Wagner-Connery Labor Relations Act, of July 5, 1935, was designed to satisfy the complaints of labor organizations against provision of the Recovery Act of 1933 as it affected them, and also to remedy their disappointment at losing the advantage of these provisions by the invalidation of that act. It declared it the policy of the United States to encourage collective bargaining and to protect employees' freedom of self-organization, and their negotiating as to their employment through representatives of their own choosing. New National Labor Relations Board created.

1933-1936. FOREIGN POLICIES of the New Deal: Nov. 17, 1933, diplomatic relations with Russia were resumed, ending policy of non-recognition which had prevailed since the overthrow of the Kerensky government in 1917.

The Johnson Debt Default Act (approved April 13, 1934) prohibited financial transactions with foreign governments in default in the payment of obligations to the United States.

The Cuban Treaty (ratified May 31, 1934) abrogated the Platt amendment.

Pan-American Conference convened at Buenos Aires, Dec. 1, 1936, addressed by President Roosevelt in person, who outlined his program for an American peace program. Secretary Hull presented the plan for a neutrality pact for American nations.

1933-1935. OTHER NEW DEAL LEGIS-LATION: The Beer-Wine Revenue Act (approved Mar. 22, 1933) levied a tax of $5 on every barrel of beer and wine manufactured; re-enacted portions of the Webb-Kenyon Act as a protection to states whose laws prohibited liquors with alcoholic content in excess of 3.2%. The states were lett in control of the sale and distribution of liquor.

May 18. The Tennessee Valley Authority Act created the Tennessee Valley authority to maintain and operate Muscle Shoals and to develop the waterpower resources of the Tennessee Valley. Also to improve the economic and social status of the valley population.

June 16. The Emergency Railroad Transportation Act created a federal co-ordinator of transportation.

June 16. The National Industrial Recovery Act created a national recovery administration to supervise the preparation of codes of fair competition and to guarantee to labor the right to organize and bargain collectively; also made provision for a program of public works. The act was declared unconstitutional by the supreme court, May 27, 1935.

Dec. 5. Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment, repealing the eighteenth or prohibition amendment.

1934, June 12. Reciprocal Tariff Act, authorizing the president, for a period of three years, to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries without the advice and consent of the Senate; gave the president the power to raise and lower

June 19. The Communications Act created a federal commission to regulate interstate and foreign communications by telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio. It abolished the federal radio commission and transferred its functions, and those of the interstate commerce commission, with respect to telephone and telegraph, to the new commission.

1935, Aug. 9. The Motor Carrier Act placed interstate bus and truck lines under control of the interstate commerce commission.

Aug. 14. Social Security Act. Its primary objects were: (1) To provide for establishing, in co-operation with each of the states, systems in the states for the payment of support to the needy aged;

(2) to pay sums to persons during limited periods after their loss of employment. Provision was also made for federal aid toward states' aid for needy, dependent children, for crippled children, for neglected children, for the vocational rehabilitation of the disabled, for health-service agencies, and for the blind. The purpose as to oldage pensions was to be effected in the first place by the government's matching states' allowance to needy persons over the age of 65 years, up to $15 a month for each case. A tax on employees and a tax at an equal rate on the payrolls of employers was to be levied, starting in 1937 at 1% and rising by steps to 3% in 1949, to provide a fund out of which, not before Jan. 1, 1942, qualified employees retiring at 65 would receive to the end of their life payments of from $10 to $15 per month.

To help states pay allowances to persons losing employment, the act created a separate tax of 1% the first year, 2 the second, and 3 the third, and thereafter on employers' payrolls, starting with the payrolls of 1936.

Aug. 26. Public Utility Holding Company Act. Purpose: (1) Doing away with holding companies among the public-utility enterprises serving communities with electricity except where such companies might be needful; (2) regulating the relations of remaining holding companies and their relations with the subsidiary companies that they controlled. The Federal Power Commission was made the administrative agency for these purposes. It was charged to proceed, after Jan. 1, 1938, to limit each holding company system to "a single, integrated public-utility system," save for minor and appropriate transgressions of the exact limit. It was to make exceptions in favor of a holding company's plural system or systems if these would suffer loss of economies by segregation, if systems were all in one state or in adjoining states, and where the combination of systems was not too great to admit of localized management, efficiency of operation, and effective regulation.

Aug. 30. Guffey-Snyder Bituminous Coal Stabilization Act. Provisions of the act followed in great measure those of the bituminous coal code under the NRA.
A national bituminous coal commission created to administer the act, particularly to establish a code for the industry, embodying mandatory features detailed in the law. These included price-fixing features and a re-enactment of sec. 7-b of the Recovery Act, obliging employers to accept labor organizations and negotiate with representatives of the employees' own choosing. A tax of 15% on the selling price or market value of soft coal produced was imposed on producers, but nine-tenths of this was remitted to producers filing acceptance of the code. Thus producers were at liberty to stay out, but must pay heavily for non-conformity. Declared unconstitutional, May, 1936.

- Aug. 30. Wealth-Tax Act. Use of federal power of taxation as a weapon against "unjust concentration of wealth and economic power." Increased surtaxes on individual yearly incomes of $50,000 and over.
- 1936, Nov. 3. Franklin D. Roosevelt reelected president over Alfred M. Landon (Republican) by 524 electoral votes to 7. He carried every state except Maine and Vermont.
- 1937, Jan. 20. FRANKLIN D. ROOSE-VELT inaugurated for second term. He was the first president to be inaugurated on this day, set by the 20th amendment to the constitution.

Widespread labor troubles Jan.-June. resulting from efforts of the C.I.O. to organize the workers in the automobile and steel industries on the basis of industrial unionism. The sit-down strike made its appearance in the General Motors strike as a weapon of labor. The strike spread to Chrysler Corporation employees and to those of the Republic Steel Corporation, the Youngstown Sheet Steel and Tube Company, the Inland Steel Company, and the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. A strike among workers of the United States Steel Corporation was avoided when the company signed a contract with the C.I.O. Mar. 2. The strike of the employees of the Republic Steel Corporation resulted in bloodshed. Although the sit-down strikes and the aggressiveness of the C.I.O. in this period seriously divided public opinion, labor, through the application of the collective-bargaining provisions of the Wagner Labor Relations Act by the national labor relations board, made substantial progress in the unionization of the mass-production industries, where the principle of collective bargaining had never before been admitted by employers.

Feb. 5. President Roosevelt in a special message to Congress recommended the enactment of legislation empowering him to appoint "additional judges in all federal courts without exception, where there are incumbent judges of retirement age who do not choose to resign." This proposal aroused widespread opposition in and out of Congress as an attempt on the part of the president to "pack" the supreme court, whose adverse decisions on various pieces of New Deal legislation had greatly displeased Mr. Roosevelt. After months of debate and controversy the bill failed of enactment, due largely to opposition of members of the president's party in the Senate.

- Apr. 26. The President signed the Guffey-Vinson Act, successor to the Bituminous Coal Act of 1935, largely invalidated by the supreme court. The act created a Bituminous Coal Commission, to administer a code covering "unfair" practices, fixing minimum and, in some cases, maximum prices for coal, and dealing with arrangements for marketing.
- May. Neutrality Act, reaffirming and somewhat enlarging statutes of Aug. 1935 and Feb. 1936. Whenever the president proclaimed a state of war outside of the Americas, the export of arms and munitions to the belligerents was to be prohibited. Certain materials designated by the president must be paid for before leaving the United States, and must be carried in foreign ships. All other trade with the combatants was subject to the cash, but not to the carry, restriction. In addition the act prohibited American citizens from traveling on belligerent ships and barred loans to warring powers.
 - Sept. 2. President Roosevelt signed the Wagner-Steagall Act, declaring a federal policy of employing government funds and credit to help states and their subdivisions to remedy the housing shortage.
 - Oct. A business recession, the gradual onset of which had been evident for several months, brought sharp declines in the stock market. By Nov. the recession had become general throughout the country.
- Nov. 15. Congress assembled in special session, with earnest recommendation of the president that it carry forward his legislative program. A bill to regulate wages and hours passed the Senate, but was recommitted in the House by a combination of Republicans and southern Democrats. Congress adjourned Dec. 21, having accomplished little of a constructive nature.
- 1938, Oct. 24. Wages and Hours Law became operative. It provided for minimum wages and maximum weekly hours in industries affecting interstate commerce; it also prohibited child labor.

Nov. 8. State and congressional elections, showing substantial Republican gains for first time since 1928.

Dec. 24. The declaration of Lima adopted by 21 American states at the session of the Pan-American Conference expressed their determination to defend themselves against all foreign intervention and envisaged consultation in case peace, security or territorial integrity should be menaced (p. 1062). The United States government favored an even stronger statement and made every effort to close the ranks of the American nations in view of the activities of the totalitarian states of Europe.

1939, Jan. 12. President Roosevelt asked Congress for $552,000,000 for de-Preparations were made for extensive fortifications in the Pacific and in the Caribbean (Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands). More and more openly the president indicated the sympathies of the United States for the European democracies. France was permitted to buy large numbers of military planes and the United States government itself embarked upon construction of 600 additional airplanes. After German annexation of Czechoslovakia the United States refused recognition of the change and imposed countervailing duties on imports from Germany. The danger of a German-Polish conflict led to

Apr. 15. Roosevelt's letter to Mussolini and Hitler asking for assurances that they would refrain from aggression on 31 named nations for 10 years and suggesting discussion of reduction of armaments and possibilities of restoring world trade. Hitler replied in a speech of Apr. 28 (p. 1005). Despite some senatorial opposition, American opinion appeared generally favorable to the president's initiative.

June. King George VI and Queen Elizabeth paid a four-day visit to the United States, the first reigning European sovereigns to set foot on American soil. Despite the obvious bid for American sympathy and support, the rulers were given a cordial reception.

Despite all efforts of the administration, Congress refused to modify the Neutrality Act which provided for an embargo on arms to belligerents. The president publicly stated that indirectly at least the Neutrality Act constituted an encouragement to a would-be aggressor. When, in August, the German-Polish conflict came to a head (p. 966), Roosevelt appealed to Victor Immanuel, Hitler and Moscicki, but without avail. The American government secured from the belligerents a promise not to bombard open cities, and Sept. 5. The United States proclaimed neutrality in the European War.

2. THE DOMINION OF CANADA

1914, Aug. 4. Entrance of Great Britain into the World War. Message of Canada to the mother country: "If unhappily war should ensue, the Canadian people will be united...to maintain the honor of the empire" (Aug. 2). Special session of Parliament called (Aug. 18) and a war budget voted. 30,000 volunteers embarked for England by the end of Sept.

1914. Nationalization of the Canadian Northern Railway forced by fear of imminent failure and a collapse of national credit. The Grand Trunk Railway was nationalized in 1920. The government operated about 23,000 miles of railway representing a capital of $1,652,000,000, known as Canadian National Railways. Gradual co-ordination of lines. Sir Henry Thornton appointed in 1922 as the non-political head of the system.

1915, Oct. 30. Death of Sir Charles Tupper, last of the "fathers of confederation."

Dec. 3. Internal war loan of $50,000,000 subscribed twice over; others for $100,000,000 (1916) and $150,000,000 (1917) were also oversubscribed.

1916, Feb. 3-4. The Parliament buildings at Ottawa were destroyed by fire. New buildings were at once begun.

Nov. 11—1921. The DUKE OF DEVON-SHIRE, governor-general.

1917, Sept. 26. Compulsory Military Service Act became law conscripting men between ages of 20 and 45.

Oct. 6. Parliament dissolved and a coalition cabinet formed. The Liberal Party was split, with Sir W. Laurier opposing conscription; French-Canadians were dissatisfied with conscription and with English language requirements in the schools and failed to enlist. The elections (Dec. 17) resulted in a sweeping victory for the coalition; Quebec unrepresented in the cabinet.

Dec. 6. Explosion in Halifax Harbor with heavy loss of life and destruction of property.

1918, Mar. Woman Franchise Bill passed extending the federal vote to all women over 21 years of age.

Apr. Riots in Quebec city due to enforcement of conscription; several civilians killed.

Nov. 11. Armistice declared (see First World War). Canadian troops returned home in the next six months. Canada supplied 640,886 men for the war; cost to Canada, over $1,500,000,000.

1919, Feb. 17. Death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

May. Strike in Winnipeg among building trades which spread to general sympathetic strike lasting five weeks. One Big Union idea active.

1920, May 10. Official announcement that Canada would be represented at Washington by a Canadian resident minister; new international status; no appointment made until 1926, but treaties with the United States on North Pacific halibut fisheries (Mar. 1923), and for mutual assistance to prevent smuggling (June 6, 1924), both signed by a Canadian official (Mr. La Pointe).

July 10. Resignation of Sir Robert Borden. Mr. Arthur Meighen prime minister.

1921, Aug. 11. Arrival of Lord Byng of Vimy as governor-general (1921–1926).

 Dec. 6. General elections resulting in Liberal (opposition) victory. Mr.
 W. L. Mackenzie King prime minister.

1923. Redistribution Bill increasing seats in House of Commons from 235 to 245, with the loss of 2 seats by the eastern provinces and the gain of 12 by the western.

1924, Mar. 21. A liquor treaty between Great Britain and the United States was ratified by the Dominion House of Commons and Apr. 4 by the Senate.

platform called for an adequate but moderate tariff, the reform of the Senate, a strong immigration policy, government steps to develop the foreign trade of the Dominion, the completion of the Hudson's Bay Railway and the reduction of grain rates. Conservatives advocated higher tariff. Liberals had ror seats in the House of Commons, Conservatives, 118, Progressives, 23, Labor, 2, Independent, 1. The Progressives held the balance of power. Premier King decided to hold on until meeting of Parliament Jan. 7, 1926.

1926. W. L. Mackenzie King maintained a precarious hold on the government to June 28, when he resigned because of customs scandal. Arthur Meighen then organized a cabinet which was defeated on the first government measure placed before Parliament.

Sept. 14. National elections. Liberals had 119 seats, but not a majority.

Sept. 25. Liberal cabinet, with King as prime minister.

Oct. 2. Lord Willingdon, new governorgeneral, came into office, superseding Lord Byng.

Nov. 10. Vincent Massey appointed first Canadian minister to Washington. 1927, Feb. William Phillips appointed 1927, Feb. William Phillips appointed American minister to Ottawa.

Nov. 15. Election of Canada to a seat in the council of the League of Nations.

1928. Appointment of Canadian diplomatic representatives to Japan and France, another evidence of Canadian nationhood. Proposal made that a British diplomatic representative to Ottawa be appointed since the governor-general is merely the personal representative of the king.

1929, Apr. 9. Canadian minister at Washington protested the sinking of the Canadian ship I'm Alone in the Gulf of Mexico by a United States coast guard prohibition patrol boat. Apr. 25 it was announced the case would be settled by arbitration.

Growing irritation in Canada at threat of hostile American tariff legislation against Canadian agricultural products.

Dec. 15. Agreement between Dominion government and the governments of Alberta and Manitoba, subject to ratification by Dominion Parliament and provincial legislatures, providing for return of natural resources to the two provinces and for continuation of the annual subsidies previously received by the provinces.

1930, May 2. Dunning Tariff became effective; most drastic tariff revision since 1907. Gave expression to uneasiness and resentment aroused in Canada by the high duties on Canadian articles contained in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff of the United States. Imports from Great Britain given preferential treatment.

July 28. National election. Basic issue the economic depression and the failure of the Liberal government to provide a policy for relief of unemployment. Conservatives asserted they would extend preferential tariff rates to Great Britain only in return for reciprocal concessions and that they would go much further than the Liberals in protecting Canadian products against American competition. Conservatives had 130 seats, a clear majority. R. B.

Bennett and Conservative cabinet took office on Aug. 7.

Sept. 8-22. Special session of Parliament to enact emergency unemployment and tariff legislation. Public works appropriation of $20,000,000 voted as an unemployment relief measure, supplemented by a similar amount from the provinces, substantial contributions by the municipalities and $21,000,000 by the railways, making a total of between 80 and oo million available for expenditure within the next 12 to 18 months. Tariff duties increased on about 125 classes of goods, including textiles, shoes, paper, agricultural implements, cast-iron pipe, fertilizers, electrical apparatus, jewelry, and meats.

Oct. 1. Transfer of natural resources to Alberta and Manitoba.

1931. In accordance with the decision of the Federal-Provincial Conference held at Ottawa, Apr. 7 and 8, the Statute of Westminster stipulated that the British North America Act should remain unchanged. The Statute of Westminster, providing that laws of the United Kingdom do not apply to any dominion unless that dominion so requests, was adopted by Parliament without a division.

May 19. Parliamentary inquiry authorized into the Beauharnois Company, engaged in construction of a hydro-electric power project in the St. Lawrence River. Inquiry revealed that although the project was basically sound it had been ruthlessly exploited for the profit of company officials and three Liberal senators who were close friends of Mackenzie King, the former Liberal premier.

June 18. Tariff of 1930 revised upward.

It was estimated that the new duties would cut off two-thirds of the goods previously imported from the United States.

1932, July 21-Aug. 21. IMPERIAL ECO-NOMIC CONFERENCE IN OT-TAWA. Seven bilateral treaties signed by Great Britain, one of them being with Canada, gave raw material of the Dominion a preference of about 10% in the British market. The United Kingdom imposed new duties on wheat and other imports in order to give Dominions this preference. British preferential tariffs also imposed on foreign meat, butter, cheese, fruit, and eggs. For Canada's benefit Great Britain removed the restriction on Canadian live cattle, placed a tariff of 4 cents on copper and promised that the 10% ad-valorem tariff on foreign timber, fish, asbestos, zinc, and lead would not be reduced unless Canada agreed. In return, Great Britain received concessions on manufactured goods entering Canada. Canada also signed new treaties with South Africa, Rhodesia, and the Irish Free State, and began the revision of existing treaties with Australia and New Zealand.

1933. Railway legislation embodying the recommendations of the royal commission in report of Sept. 1932. Three trustees for C.N.R. and co-operation between it and the Canadian Pacific.

May 12. Trade agreement with France signed, and went into effect June 10. It provided for reciprocal tariff preferences on 1148 items.

Aug. 25. Canada joined in wheat agreement with United States, Argentina, Australia, and Soviet Union. The countries agreed to export a maximum of 500,000,000 bushels for 1933-1934, and, except for the Soviet Union and Danubian states, promised to reduce either acreage or exports by 15%.

1934, July 3. The Natural Products
Marketing Act assented to. It provided for the creation of a Dominion marketing board with powers to form local boards and to co-operate with marketing boards created by the provinces, and authorized the regulated marketing of any natural products, control by license of the export of any regulated products, and control of interprovincial marketing. The Dominion marketing board authorized to investigate and regulate price spreads in the handling of natural or regulated products.

Aug. 4. H. H. Stevens, minister of trade and commerce, in a privately printed pamphlet, made revelations which transformed widespread popular demand for governmental action to alleviate the depression into a demand for regulation of big business in Canada. Stevens resigned his cabinet position Oct. 27.

Oct. 1. The Dominion Companies Act went into force. Repealed the Companies Act of 1927 and established stringent regulations safeguarding the security of investors, shareholders, and creditors.

1935, Mar. 11. The Bank of Canada opened its doors, making effective the Bank of Canada Act of 1934. This privately owned but government-supervised institution served as a central bank.

Prime Minister Bennett early in the year proposed a sweeping platform of social legislation as the only means of escaping defeat in the face of growing popular dissatisfaction. Before adjourning July 5, Parliament enacted a comprehensive series of laws designed to cope with the economic situation. Among them were: The Wheat Board Act, establishing a board to buy wheat at a fixed minimum price, the government to absorb the loss if the board failed to sell the wheat at a profit over the fixed minimum. An act providing for a Dominion trade and industry commission to administer the Combines Investigation Act, prohibiting monopolies operating to the detriment of the public; a Fair Wages and Hours of Labor Act, guaranteeing fair wages on public works and a 44-hour week. An Employment and Social Insurance Act, providing for contributory unemployment insurance for workers receiving less than $2000 per year, with certain industries excepted; equal premiums to be paid by employers, employees, and federal government. The Minimum Wage Act, authorizing the establishment of a federal agency to fix minimum wages in manufacturing and commerce. The Limitation of Hours of Work Act providing for 8-hour day and 48hour week for industrial workers.

Aug. 14. Dissolution of Parliament and call for general election.

Aug. 22. Victory of the Social Credit Party in Alberta, under leadership of William Aberhart, promising to every adult citizen of the province a regular income of $25 per month, funds for which were to be provided by a turnover tax of about 10% on domestic products. Deathblow to Alberta's credit.

Oct. 14. General election, a Liberal landslide gave Liberals 171 seats, with 8 seats held by independent Liberals who would ordinarily support the party.

Oct. 23. William Lyon Mackenzie King, prime minister for the third time.

Nov. 15. Prime Minister King signed at Washington the reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. The treaty granted Canada lower rates or other concessions on two-thirds of her exports by volume to the United States. The United States, in turn, received concessions on three-fourths of her dutiable exports to Canada.

Dec. 9-13. Conference of federal and provincial governments agreed unanimously that it was "imperative" to amend the constitution, and that Canada should have the power to amend its own constitution. A committee was appointed to study a procedure under which Canada could amend the British North America Act without recourse to the British Parlia-

1936, June 17. Supreme court of Canada invalidated most of "New Deal" legislation enacted by the Bennett government in 1935.

1937, Jan. 28. The judicial committee of the privy council in London, Eng., declared unconstitutional the bulk of the "New Deal" legislation of the Bennett government, thereby sustaining the decision of the supreme court of Canada of the previous year.

Apr. The demand of the C.I.O. for the recognition of the local branch of the N.A.W.A. (an affiliate of the C.I.O.) in the Oshawa, Ontario, plant of the General Motors Corporation led to a sit-down strike. Premier Hepburn of Ontario intervened, denounced the C.I.O., and brought about an agreement (Apr. 23) granting concessions to workers on wages and working conditions, but withholding recognition of the N.A.W.A.

The Dominion minister of justice announced (Mar. 24) that the sit-down strike was wholly illegal in Canada and that all the powers of the government would be used to prevent its use in the Dominion.

Aug. 15. Prime Minister Mackenzie King appointed a royal commission (Rowell commission) to study amendment of the British North America Act, which now seemed imperative in view of the court decisions on social and economic legislation. The commission was charged specifically to consider the economic and financial relations between the federal and provincial governments, but was given wide powers to investigate all phases of the confederation.

1939, May. Visit of King George VI and Queen Elizabeth to Canada. They were the first reigning sovereigns to visit the Dominion and were given an enthusiastic reception.

Sept. 3. England's declaration of war on Germany (p. 967) brought forth expressions of solidarity in Canada and the government at once took steps to aid the mother country in the great conflict.

3. NEWFOUNDLAND

1914, Aug. 4. Declaration of war by Great Britain. Newfoundland, like the other members of the empire, supported the mother country and sent troops. 1917. Resignation of Premier Morris, who was succeeded by Mr. (later Sir) W. F. Lloyd.

1919, May 23. The Hon. M. P. Cashin, premier. Elections (Nov. 1) resulted in the overthrow of the Cashin ministry and Sir Richard A. Squires became premier.

1923. William R. Warren, premier.

Dec. 26. Grave charges of misappropriation of funds brought against Sir Richard Squires and others (later acquitted) by Premier Warren. The latter was defeated in the Assembly following the arrest of Squires (Apr. 22, 1924) and resigned. He was succeeded by Mr. Walter Munroe.

1933. NEWFOUNDLAND LOST ITS STATUS AS A DOMINION, and reverted to that of a crown colony, because of debt resulting from incompetence and corruption. A royal commission (appointed in Mar.) reported (Nov.) the following recommendations: (1) Replacement of the existing form of government by a special commission consisting of three Englishmen and three Newfoundlanders, with the governor as president. This commission was to have legal and executive authority subject to the supervisory control of the British government. (2) Readjustment and lowering of tariffs. (3) Assumption by the United Kingdom of responsibility for Newfoundland finances until the island should have become self-supporting. These recommendations were approved by the Newfoundland Parliament Nov. 29 and received the royal assent Dec. 21.

1934. Substantial progress toward economic and financial recovery.

Oct. 1. The commission announced that Jan. 1, 1935, import duties would be revised, generally downward.

1936-1937. The commission continued to devote itself to the problem of economic rehabilitation, giving particular attention to the development of alternative sources of employment, to the encouragement of subsistence farming, to the relief of poverty, and to the improvement of medical and educational facilities.

D. LATIN AMERICA

1. GENERAL

Though most of the Latin-American states, at the suggestion of the United States government, either declared war on Germany or broke off diplomatic relations, they played no part in the war from the military viewpoint. Nevertheless the war period was of utmost importance for the entire region, in view of the fact that the demand for raw materials made possible a phenomenal expansion of trade. Excepting for the slump of 1920-1921 this expansion was steady from 1916 to 1929. It was accompanied by great capital investments, especially by the United States, after the war, and by the emergence in the more advanced countries of a local industry. The growth of the urban middle classes enabled them to dispute with the great landholders the control of the government. At the same time the agrarian proletariat (on coffee, sugar, and other plantations) was reinforced by workers in the oil-fields and mines, as well as those in the factories. The result was increased demand for social legislation (carried out, however imperfectly, in several states), together with political organization of the lower classes (in many instances in alliance with the middle classes, at least for a time). These basic social changes created a ferment throughout the continent, the world depression adding its share to stimulate un-

Between the different Latin-American states and between Latin America and the United States co-operation along various lines became ever more common, despite periods of profound distrust between Latin America and the great neighbor in the north.

1915, May 24. The first Pan-American Financial Conference met at Washington.

May 25. Conclusion of an arbitration treaty between Argentina, Brazil, and Chile (the A.B.C. Powers).

1916, Apr. 3. A Pan-American high commission, meeting at Buenos Aires, worked out a scheme for improvement of telegraph and railway communication. A permanent high commission was created to elaborate uniform commercial laws.

1923, Mar.-May. The fourth Pan-American Conference at Santiago resulted in various conventions providing for fact-finding commissions in cases of disputes, for trademark regulations, publication of documents, etc., in addition to many resolutions touching health, education, etc.

May 3. Signature of the Pan-American treaty for the pacific settlement of disputes.

1928, Jan.-Feb. The sixth Pan-American Conference met at Havana. The Pan-American Union was placed on a treaty basis and various conferences arranged for matters of common interest. The United States, however, opposed a resolution directed against intervention in the internal affairs of other states.

Dec.—1929, Jan. The Pan-American Conference on conciliation and arbitration met at Washington, revised the treaty of May 3, 1924, declared for conciliation and arbitration of all disputes and set up commissions to deal with cases as they should arise.

1930, Sept. Meeting of the first Pan-American Conference on agriculture at Washington.

1933. President Roosevelt declared publicly against a policy of intervention in Latin America and did his utmost to demonstrate his policy of the "good neighbor." At the 1933. Seventh Pan-American Conference, at Montevideo, Secretary Hull did his utmost to remove distrust of the United States and impress upon the American states the need for confidence and collaboration.

1936, Dec. 1-23. Pan-American Conference for the maintenance of peace, in session at Buenos Aires. The American governments for the first time accepted the principle of consultation in case the peace of the continent should be threatened. A convention was drawn up to provide for a common policy of neutrality in the event of conflict between American states.

1938, Dec. 24. The Pan-American Conference, meeting at Lima (21 states represented) adopted the Declaration of Lima, which reaffirmed the absolute sovereignty of the various American states, but also expressed their determination to defend themselves against "all foreign intervention" or activities that may threaten them." It provided further for consultation in case "peace, security, or territorial integrity" of any state should be menaced. The declaration was a reflection of growing uneasiness, especially in the United States, with regard to possible designs of the fascist powers of Europe upon Latin-American territory, and, because of Argentine opposition, was less outspoken than the United States government would have desired.

2. ARGENTINA

1916-1922. HIPÓLITO IRIGOYEN, leader of the Argentine radicals, was elected president after an electoral reform (1912) had made possible the expression of popular (mass) sentiment. During his administration he carried through a program of social reform (factory acts, regulations of hours, pensions, etc.). Irigoyen refused to give up neutrality during the World War, although diplomatic relations with Germany were strained after the sinking of Argentine ships by German submarines (1917). Argentina supplied huge quantities of wheat and meat to the Allied Powers.

1920. Argentina became an original member of the League of Nations, but withdrew from the assembly in 1921 on rejection of an Argentine resolution that all sovereign states be admitted to the League.

1922-1928. MARCELO ALVEAR, president. In general he continued the policies of his predecessor in the sphere of social legislation.

1928. Irigoyen was again elected to the presidency, but

1930, Sept. 6. JOSÉ URIBURU forced him from office. Irigoyen's assumption of wide personal powers had aroused much criticism, while the distress created by the world depression had provoked a loud demand for further relief measures. With Uriburu the landowning and big business and other conservative groups returned to power. After a temporary dictatorship of Uriburu 1932-1937. AGUSTÍN JUSTO was regularly elected president. Political and social unrest continued and culminated in an unsuccessful radical revolt in the northeastern provinces (1933-1934).

1932, Nov. 17. Saavedra Lamas, the foreign minister, published a proposed South American anti-war pact, which had already been accepted by several states. Argentina also (1933) resumed full membership in the League of Nations, taking an active part in the negotiations concerning the war between Bolivia and Paraguay (p. 1066).

1933. The government launched a program of national economic recovery, which achieved marked success. A commercial treaty with Great Britain made possible the shipment of large quantities of beef and wheat.

1935. Conflict between the Conservative government of Justo and the opposition Radical and Socialist parties, which represented the majority of voters, reached serious proportions. Fascist organizations also opposed the government and formed a common front of the extreme Right (Oct.).

1936, Mar. In congressional elections, postponed from late in 1935, the Radical Party, under the leadership of former president Alvear, triumphed. A Leftist Popular Front was organized (May I), but fascist groups continued to gain ground. The Rightist elements supporting the government formed a National Front, favoring a conservative dictatorship (May 31). The Communist Party was declared illegal (Nov. 10).

bitterly contested. Roberto M.
Ortiz, candidate of the government, was elected over the nominee of the Radical Party, Alvear. Efforts of the Leftist parties to prevent a quorum in a joint session of Congress to confirm the election failed when a majority was declared sufficient, and Ortiz was proclaimed elected. He was inaugurated Feb. 10, 1938.

3. CHILE

Chile remained neutral in the World War despite violation of her neutrality by both German and British warships. The export of nitrate in large quantities to the Allied Powers created a period of great prosperity.

1920, Jan. 10. Chile became a member of the League of Nations.

1920-1921. Chile suffered severely from the general world slump and the cessation of the demand for nitrate. The lower classes loudly demanded a more democratic régime and extensive social legislation.

1920-1924. ARTURO ALESSANDRI. elected president after a disputed He was the candidate of the Liberal Alliance Party and advocated wide political, religious, and social reforms. His election represented a victory for the middle classes, supported by labor elements. But during his term Alessandri was unable to achieve much, partly because of the stagnation of government under the parliamentary system. In 1924 he was forced from After control by a military junta office. under Gen. Luis Altamirano, 1925, Jan. 23. A coup d'état engineered by Maj. Cárlos Ibañez resulted in the recall of Alessandri and the promulgation of a

Sept. 18. New constitution, providing for responsibility of the cabinet to the president, broader suffrage, separation of Church and State, provincial autonomy, etc.

Oct. 1. Alessandri resigned, in view of the continued disorder and uncertainty. He was succeeded by 1925-1927. EMILIANO FIGUEROA, who was, in turn, forced out by 1927-1931. GEN. CÁRLOS IBAÑEZ, who made himself dictator-president, and then promulgated many of the social reforms which Alessandri had advocated.

1929, June 3. SETTLEMENT OF THE TACNA-ARICA QUESTION, which had embittered the relations of Chile and Peru for many years (diplomatic relations severed 1910). Efforts of the United States (1922–1926) to mediate and effect a settlement through a plebiscite led to no result, but served to bring about direct negotiations and the final agreement, by which Chile received Arica and Peru was awarded Tacna, Chile agreeing to accord Peru port and transportation facilities at Arica. Chile retained all territory taken from Bolivia (despite appeals of that country to the United States and Argentina), but accorded Bolivia a railway outlet to the Pacific. Thenceforth Chile and Bolivia drew closer. In 1936 they concluded a treaty providing for united diplomatic action. Closer economic and cultural relations followed (1037).

Ibañez resigned because of the general discontent with his measures of economy (made necessary by the world depression).

1931. JUAN MONTERO, representative of the conservative elements, was elected in opposition to Alessandri. Political and social unrest continued, and 1932, June 4. Montero was overthrown. A junta headed by Cárlos Dávila assumed power and adopted a socialistic policy, but Sept. 13. Dávila was overthrown by a military coup and Alessandri became president once more, after an election (Dec. 24).

THE GOVERNMENT OF 1932-1938. ALESSANDRI, supported by a coalition of Conservative and Liberal parties, assumed ever greater control of economic activity, enacting far-reaching social reforms. Marked improvement of economic conditions after 1933 did not, however, relieve the political tension. The government was opposed on the one hand by fascist groups, on the other by Communists.

1937, Mar. 5. Alessandri and the Rightist bloc won a victory in the elections over the Popular Front parties.

1938, Sept. 5. A fascist (Nacista) uprising proved abortive, but in the ensuing elections the parties of the Left elected 1938-PEDRO AGUIRRE CEDRA, president. The Popular Front comprised Radicals, Socialists, and Communists, as against the combination of Conservative, Agrarian, and Liberal parties which supported Gustavo Ross. The new régime promptly embarked on a policy of helping the worker (low bread prices, housing, education), despite strong protests from the agrarian groups.

PARAGUAY

The presidency of Edward Schaerer was an era of progress and relative political stability. Trade, industry, grazing, and agriculture expanded, transportation and communications were improved, and foreign capital was invested. Paraguay remained neutral during the First World War, and in 1920 became an original member of the League of Nations. 1916-1919. Manuel Franco, president. On his death 1919-1920. José Montero, the vicepresident, succeeded.

1920-1921. Manuel Gondra, president. He was forced to resign by a revolutionary group. After the short presidencies of Eusebio Ayala (1921–1923), Eligio Ayala (1923–1924) and Luis Riart (1924), 1924-1928. ELIGIO AYALA was elected president. Representing the Liberal groups, he inaugurated a policy of social legislation.

1928-1931. JOSÉ GUGGIARI, president.
During his administration

1928-1930. The dispute with Bolivia over the Chaco territory came to a head. Despite earlier agreements (1913, 1915) the respective claims were still unsettled. Dec. 6, 1928, the forces of the two states clashed and war seemed inevitable. Diplomatic relations were severed and Paraguay appealed to the League of Nations, but the Pan-American Conference at once offered to mediate. An arbitration convention was drafted (Aug. 31, 1929), but was rejected by both parties. Direct negotiations were agreed to, but skirmishes in the contested area continued until a temporary arrangement (return to status quo ante) was arrived at (Apr. 4, 1930).

1932-1935. THE CHACO WAR. The League of Nations and the Pan-American Union both called upon the two parties to desist from hostilities and accept neutral arbitration, but the numerous efforts to preserve peace resulted chiefly in added confusion. Neither side was ready to accept peace offers and the war continued. The Paraguayans, after a series of major campaigns, occupied the larger part of the Chaco, but failed in their attempts to invade Bolivian territory. During the war the relations between Paraguay and Chile became badly strained because of service of Chilean officers with the Bolivian army and employment of Chilean workmen by Bolivia.

1935. At the suggestion of the League of Nations, some 20 nations lifted the embargo on arms in favor of Bolivia, while retaining it against Paraguay. Thereupon Paraguay announced withdrawal from the League.

June 14. Paraguay and Bolivia concluded a truce, at the instance of the United States and five of the South-American governments. A peace conference at Buenos Aires was arranged for, and met in July. Definitive peace was not signed until July 21, 1038 (approved by plebiscite Aug. 10). The treaty provided for arbitration of boundaries between American states. The territorial award, made by six American presidents (Oct. 10), assigned the greater part of the Chaco to Paraguay, but provided Bolivia with an outlet to the sea by way of the Paraguay River.

1936, Feb. 17. A military revolt, provoked by opposition of the army to the supposed weakness of the government in the peace negotiations, led to the overthrow of President Ayala. Rafael Franco became provisional president. Supported by a junta of officers, and by radical and nationalist elements, he made himself a military dictator.

Mar. 11. Franco proclaimed a totalitarian state, and introduced economic, social, and financial reforms. These policies antagonized Paraguayan and foreign interests, which resented the heavy taxation.

1937, Aug. 15. Franco was forced to resign as a result of a bloodless coup d'état. Felix Pavia, of the Liberal Party, became provisional president and suppressed a number of counter-revolutionary movements.

Oct. 11. Pavia was elected constitutional president.

1939, Apr. 30. José Félix Estigarribia was elected president.

5. URUGUAY

Uruguay has, in the 20th century, enjoyed comparative stability and prosperity.

During the administrations of 1907-1911. Claudio Williman, 1911-1915. José Batlle y Ordóñez, 1915-1919. Feliciano Viera,

1919-1928. Baltasar Brum, and their successors, many social and administrative reforms were initiated and the internal development of the country was rapid.

On the entry of the United States into the First World War, Uruguay expressed moral solidarity and later severed relations with Germany.

curtailed the powers of the president, created a national council of administration (9 members elected on proportional basis by popular vote and endowed with important functions), and disestablished the Roman Catholic Church.

1920. Uruguay joined the League of Nations.

1923-1927. José Serrato, president. He and his successor.

1927-1931. Juan Compisteguy, continued and accelerated the policy of social reform until Uruguay, like the rest of the world, began to feel the pinch of the depression.

1931-1938. GABRIEL TERRA, president.

He represented the more advanced wing of the Liberal Party, and soon found himself in conflict with the national council of administration concerning the division of executive authority. In view of the political and social unrest and the consequent threat of civil war.

1933. Terra established a temporary dictatorship.

1934, Apr. 19. A new constitution provided for a strong executive, restricted the powers of Parliament, and established compulsory voting. Terra was re-elected president and 1935. A revolt against him was crushed.

1935-1938. The Terra government continued the work of social and economic reform, and Uruguay gradually experienced economic improvement.

1938- Alfredo Baldomir elected president to succeed Terra.

6. BOLIVIA

1917, Apr. 13. Bolivia severed relations with Germany, but did not declare war.

1917-1920. José Gutiérrez Guerra, president.

1920, Jan. 10. Bolivia became an original member of the League of Nations.

Mar. 16. In the Tacna-Arica dispute, the Bolivian government took the stand that neither Chile nor Peru was entitled to the provinces. The Bolivian government claimed access to the Pacific, preferably through the port of Arica. Nov.
I Bolivia appealed in vain to the League of Nations to secure such an access.

July 11. A coup d'état led to the overthrow of Gutiérrez Guerra, and 1921-1925. BAUTISTA SAAVEDRA became president. His administration was marked by industrial development: public improvements, encouragement of agriculture and mining, flotation of large loans in the United States, etc. The exploitation of oil added greatly to the national resources.

1925, May 2. José Cabino Villanueva, president. His election was annulled (Sept. 1) by Congress, because of fraud. Villanueva fled the country and 1926-1930. HERNANDO SILES became president.

1928-1929. Dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay over the Chaco region; war temporarily averted through the League and mediation of the American powers (p. 1066).

1929. Settlement of the Tacna-Arica question (p. 1065). Bolivia definitely lost Atacama, but obtained the right to use the Chilean-built railway between La Paz and Arica.

1930, May 28. Overthrow of President Siles, whose régime had become unpopular through economic depression, fall in the price of tin, closing of the mines, and resultant labor unrest. After a temporary government by a military junta, led by Gen. Carlos Blanco Galinda,

1931. DANIEL SALAMANCA was elected president.

1932-1935. THE CHACO WAR, between Bolivia and Paraguay (p. 1066).

1934, Dec. President Salamanca was overthrown by a military coup, following serious defeats of the Bolivian forces. The vice-president, Luis Tejada Sorzano, assumed the presidency.

1936, May 17. Another coup led to the fall of Tejada Sorzano, who was replaced by a joint civil and military junta under David Toro, who established a dictatorship. Measures to promote economic revival were adopted (virtual government monopoly over the petroleum industry; confiscation of Standard Oil Co. properties, Mar., 1937; efforts to control mining and banking). Toro's policies aroused much opposition and 1937, July 14. Toro was driven from office by fellow army officers.

1938- GERMÁN BUSCH succeeded as president.

1939, Apr. 24. Busch suddenly assumed dictatorial powers, dissolving congress and suspending the constitution. All connection with European totalitarianism was, however, denied.

7. PERU

1914, Feb. 4. A military revolt led to the overthrow of President Guillermo Billinghurst.

1914-1915. Col. Oscar Benavides served as provisional president.

1915-1919. José Pardo, president.

1917, Oct. 5. Peru severed relations with Germany, after attacks on Peruvian ships.

1919, July 4. A coup d'état led to the resignation and imprisonment of President Pardo, who was succeeded (Aug. 24) by 1919-1930. AUGUSTO LEGUÍA as president. Leguía's administration was noteworthy for great material progress. An extensive program of internal reform was undertaken, large loans were secured in the United States (1924, 1927, 1928), education was expanded, relations of Church and State revised, social and labor legislation enacted. For the rest Leguía's régime was notorious for corruption.

1919, Dec. 27. A new constitution (went into effect Jan. 18, 1920) introduced compulsory primary education, compulsory labor arbitration, income tax, etc.

1920, Jan. 10. Like most Latin-American states, Peru joined the League of Nations at the very outset.

1921-1929. The long-drawn dispute with Chile over Tacna and Arica (p. 1065), when finally settled, assigned Tacna to Peru.

1924, June 21. Signature of a protocol with Ecuador, envisaging negotiations concerning the old boundary dispute, and providing for arbitration in the event of failure of direct discussion.

1930, Aug. 25. RESIGNATION AND FLIGHT OF LEGUÍA, following a revolt led by Col. Luis Sánchez Cerro. Leguía was captured and tried, but was acquitted. Sánchez Cerro became provisional president, but 1931, Feb.-Mar. A series of revolts obliged Sánchez Cerro to give way to David Samanez Ocampo.

Oct. 11. Sánchez Cerro was elected president.

1932-1933. Threat of war with Colombia, over the disputed territory of Leticia. Peru took a strong line and prepared for war, though accepting proffered mediation of the League. The question was finally settled by agreement Nov. 2, 1933, Apr. 9. A new constitution was introduced.

Apr. 30. Assassination of Sánchez Cerro. He was succeeded at once by oscar benavides, as president. Social and political unrest continued, despite the gradual recovery of the country from the depression. Benavides, supported by conservative and clerical elements, was opposed by the radical Apra (Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana), an organization in which the student element was strong. The Aprista opposition was held down with an iron hand.

1936, Oct. 11. The elections resulted in the defeat of Benavides' candidate by the Leftist groups, a Socialist being chosen president. Thereupon Benavides had the elections declared null and had his own term prolonged for three years.

Dec. 8. The constituent assembly was dissolved and Benavides became virtually a dictator. The radical opposition was suppressed (Public Security Law of Feb. 21, 1937) and efforts were made to counteract radicalism by the extension of social reform activities.

1938, June. The boundary dispute with Ecuador threatened to end in war when the troops of the two states clashed on the frontier. Oct. 12 Ecuador appealed to several American presidents to mediate, but Peru took an uncompromising attitude toward Ecuadorean demands for cession of territory.

8. ECUADOR

1916-1920. Alfredo Baquerizo Moreno, president.

1917, Dec. 7. Ecuador severed relations with Germany because of the submarine campaign, but did not, like most other Latin-American states, join the League of Nations at the conclusion of the war. During the war and immediate postwar period much progress was made in education, social legislation, and above all sanitation (work of the American Col. Gorgas at Guayaquil, long a center of bubonic plague).

1920-1924. José Luis Tamayo, president. He was succeeded by Gonzalo Córdova, who was 1924-1925. driven from office by a military revolt led by Gen Francisco Gómez de la Torre (July 9, 1925).

ISIDRO AYORA, president. 1926-1931. He introduced

1929, Mar. 28. A new constitution which ended the military régime set up in 1925, but paved the way for endless disputes between the executive and the legislature. Ayora had elaborate social and labor laws enacted and adopted many financial reforms.

1931, Aug. 25. Ayora resigned. Col. Luis Alba became provisional president, but was forced to flee after a coup d'état (Oct.). There followed a period of utter confusion, marked by conflict between the executive and legislature and between the conservative and liberal groups. After the suppression of a revolt (Aug. 1932), Martinez Mera became president, only to be replaced in Dec. 1933 by J. M. Velasco Ibarra.

1932-1934. The Leticia dispute between Peru and Colombia (p. 1068) gave Ecuador an opportunity to assert claims to portions of the Amazon Basin. In part motivated by these desires.

1934, Sept. 28. ECUADOR ENTERED THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

1935, Aug. 20. President Ibarra was overthrown by a military junta, after he had attempted to assume dictatorial powers. He was replaced by Antonio Pons, who, in turn, was forced to resign.

Sept. 26. A military dictatorship under Federico Páez was set up. to prevent the election of a conservative (the dominant Liberal Party was split by dissensions).

1935-1937. DICTATORSHIP OF PAEZ. He suppressed a number of movements directed against his régime. but after a conflict with a constituent assembly, convened to promulgate a new constitution.

1937. Oct. 22. Páez was obliged to resign. 1937-1938. Gen. G. Alberto Enriquez became provisional president. With support of the army he adopted strong measures to maintain his authority. At the same time he liberated many political prisoners, abrogated objectionable repressive legislation, and embarked upon the work of financial and legal reform. 1938, June-Oct. Growing tension in relations with Peru, due to the long-standing dispute about the boundary (p. 1068).

Dec. 2. The Ecuador Congress elected Aurelio Mosquera Narváez presi-

COLOMBIA

1914-1918. José V. Concha, president. He represented the conservative groups which had been in power since 1884 and which continued to rule the country until 1930. But even the conservative administrations of Colombia were obliged to initiate a measure of social legislation to meet growing pressure from the lower classes.

Colombia remained neutral during the First World War, but joined the League of Nations (Feb. 16, 1920).

1918-1921. Marco Fidel Suárez, president. 1919, Aug. 15. Signature of a contract with the Tropical Oil Company for exploitation of the Colombian oilfields, one of the most important sources of national wealth.

1921, Apr. 20. The United States Senate finally ratified the Thomson-Urrutia Treaty (concluded 1914) with certain modifications, thus ending the long dispute with regard to Panama. The Colombian Congress ratified it Dec. 22.

1922-1926. PEDRO NEL OSPINA, presi-

1922, Mar. 24. An award by the Swiss Federal Council ended a longstanding boundary dispute with Venezuela in favor of Colombia. A boundary treaty with Peru settled the frontier on that 1926-1930. MIGUEL ABADIA MENDEZ, president. During his administration the growing social tension found an outlet in a number of major strikes, in the course of which many were killed by the police and government forces.

1930-1934. The election of ENRIQUE OLAYA HERRERA, a moderate liberal, brought to an end the long domination of the conservative groups. The world depression brought with it a rapid decline in coffee prices, and necessitated heavy borrowing.

1932-1934. THE LETICIA DISPUTE with Peru (p. 1068). Occupation of the town of Leticia by armed Peruvians brought the two countries to the verge of war. Under pressure from the Latin-American powers and the United States the disputants finally permitted supervision of the area by a League of Nations commission. By the final settlement (1934) Peru and Colombia proclaimed peace and amity and renounced armed action.

1934-1938. ALFONSO LÓPEZ became president, continuing the rule of the Liberal Party. The government now embarked upon far-reaching social reforms, aiming at government control of sub-soil riches, agrarian reforms, etc. Primary education was made free and compulsory, and the Catholic Church was disestablished. All these policies called forth the opposition of the conservatives and clericals, who were further aided by the split in the Liberal ranks into moderate and progressive or even radical wings. Nevertheless, in the 1938. Election the Liberals were able to maintain a majority, and 1938- EDUARDO SANTOS, a moderate Liberal, became president.

The Liberals won in the elections of Mar. 19, 1939.

10. VENEZUELA

1909-1935. Dictatorship of JUAN VI-CENTE GÓMEZ, who served during this period as either president or chief of the army. Gomez pursued a policy of nepotism and took care to have a congress entirely subservient to him. For the rest, the period of his rule was marked by striking material progress: administrative reforms were adopted, finances stabilized (national debt liquidated 1930), commerce and industry encouraged. After the opening of the Venezuela oil-fields (1918), the country soon became one of the leading oil producers, thus adding greatly to its wealth. On the other hand, the industrial development implied a growth of a proletarian class and a spread of radicalism which found much support among the students. latter became active opponents of the dictatorship.

Venezuela maintained neutrality during the First World War, but 1920, Mar. 3. Joined the League of Nations.

1929, 1931. Revolts led by Gen. Arévalo Cedeño were put down, as were other opposition movements directed against the Gómez régime.

1935, Dec. 18. Death of President Gómez ended the dictatorship. Gen. Contreras became provisional president and succeeded in suppressing the disorders that broke out after the death of the strong

July 16. A new constitution provided that the president's term should be limited to five years, with no eligibility for re-election.

1937, Jan. Elections were held for about one-third of the seats in Congress. These turned out to be a decisive victory for the Left parties, whereupon (Feb. 4) the government arrested many of the leaders of the Left (including newly elected congressmen) on the charge of communism. Most of these leaders were exiled, and most of the radical organizations (including the Federation of Students) were dissolved. The new president then did his utmost to suppress radicalism, but at the same time he embarked on a far-reaching program of social reform designed to meet the needs and demands of the lower classes and to check the spread of subversive tendencies.

11. BRAZIL

1914-1918. Wenceslau Braz Pereira Gomes, president.

1915, May 25. Agreement with Argentina and Chile (A.B.C. Treaty) providing for arbitration of disputes.

1917 Oct 25. BRAZIL DECLARED WAR

1917, Oct. 26. BRAZIL DECLARED WAR ON GERMANY. Relations had been severed Apr. 11 after sinking of Brazilian ships. During the war Brazilian warships co-operated with the Allies and Brazil furnished large stocks of food and raw materials. 1918. Rodriguez Alves, president. He died (1919) before assuming office, and was succeeded by 1919-1922. EPITACIO PESSOA as president.

1920, Jan. 10. Brazil joined the League of Nations as an original member.

1922-1926. ARTURO DA SILVA BER-NARDES, president. Widespread discontent with the governmental system led to a

1924, July. Formidable revolt in São Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul, led by Gen. Isidor Lopes. After suppression of the insurrection, the government undertook certain economic reforms.

1926, June 14. Brazil announced withdrawal from the League of Nations (effective 1928), after failure to secure a permanent seat on the council.

1926-1930. WASHINGTON LUIS PE-REIRA DE SOUZA, president. He maintained order and tried, without much success, to improve the finances. Social unrest developed rapidly during this period and resulted in drastic measures against strikes and communism (strikes illegal, Aug. 13, 1927).

1930. The election of the Conservative
Julio Prestes as president pro-

Oct. A GREAT REVOLT IN THE SOUTHERN PROVINCES, led by Getulio Vargas, governor of Rio Grande do Sul. Vargas accepted the presidency (Oct. 26) and forced Pereira de Souza to resign (Oct. 30).

1931. Establishment of the National Coffee Department, which year after year supervised the destruction of large quantities of coffee, in the hope of maintaining a good price in the world market. Coffee being Brazil's chief export article, the collapse of prices during the depression created much financial difficulty.

1932, July-Oct. A revolt broke out in São Paulo, which was successfully mastered by the government. The movement was the result of rivalry between São Paulo and Minas Gerâes for control of the federal government.

1933. The government introduced a program of economic rehabilitation, with numerous social and political reforms, including 1934, July 16. A new constitution which involved greater centralization of control. The president was henceforth to be elected by Congress and was not to be eligible for re-election.

1934-1937. VARGAS was elected president under the new system. Economic conditions gradually improved, but social and political unrest increased. Among the industrial and plantation workers radical and communist propaganda made marked progress, while among the middle classes a strong fascist (Integralista) green shirt movement gained many adherents. The communist movement was said to be supported from Moscow, while the new Nazi government in Germany, whether connected with the Integralista group or not, unfolded an active and rather successful propaganda among the many Germans in the southern provinces. Barter arrangements with Germany resulted in a huge increase of trade between the two countries.

1935, Nov. A communist revolt broke out in Pernambuco and then in Rio de Janeiro. Though suppressed within a week, the revolt gave the government an excuse for the introduction of martial law. The president was granted almost dictatorial powers, a strict censorship was inaugurated and special tribunals were set up to try communist leaders.

1937, Nov. 10. VARGAS PROCLAIMED

A NEW CONSTITUTION, after months of heated rivalry respecting the succession to the presidency. The new constitution gave the president full dictatorial powers and established a system of corporative nature (organization of a national economic council). The president announced that the new régime was not fascist, but the distinction was not very obvious.

1938, May 11. An Integralista rising was put down by the government without much difficulty.

1939, Mar. 9. Brazil concluded a series of agreements with the United States, thereby obtaining financial aid and support in the work of general economic development.

12. CENTRAL AMERICA

a. GENERAL

After the declaration of war on Germany by the United States, the states of Central America severed relations with Germany and ultimately declared war, mostly in 1918 (Panama, Apr. 7, 1917; Costa Rica, Mar. 23, 1918; Ricaragua, May 8, 1918; Honduras, July 19, 1918; Guatemaia, Apr. 23, 1918). After the war almost all of them became members of the League of Nations (Salvador joined in 1924, the others in 1920).

In the political sphere most of these states have continued in most unstable conditions, with numerous insurrections and overturns. Common to all of them has been the growing class consciousness of the laborers on banana, coffee, and sugar plantations, which came to constitute an ever more formidable challenge to the ruling groups. Despite representative machinery, the governments in many states are essentially dictatorships. During the 1920's the United States government intervened frequently in order to protect American lives and property. This policy, among other things, aroused much hostility toward the United States throughout Latin America, and has since been replaced by the "good neighbor policy," which eschews intervention.

1918, Mar. 10. The Central American court was dissolved after denunciation by Nicaragua and failure of the members to renew the arrangements.

THE PACT OF UNION be-1921-1922. tween Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and Salvador, signed at San José (Jan. 19, 1921). The agreement set up an indissoluble and perpetual union, to be called the Federation of Central America. A provisional federal council was organized (June 17) and V. Martinez of Guatemala became president. Oct. 10 the federal constitution was completed, but once again the project of union was to be frustrated. Dec. 8 a revolution broke out in Guatemala, directed against the government's policy of federation. With its success the whole scheme fell through and the federation was dissolved (Jan. 29, 1922). Since that time there has been chronic trouble about frontiers between the different states, with occasional danger of war.

American Conference met at Washington at the instance of the United States government, which hoped to terminate the dangerous friction between Nicaragua and Honduras. A general treaty of neutrality was drawn up, provision was made for the creation of a Central American court of justice, and measures to limit armaments and to further economic development were envisaged. The majority of the states ratified the treaties by 1926, but little was done to put them into effect.

b. PANAMA

1918. The constitution was amended to provide for the election of provincial governors.

1921. A boundary dispute with Costa Rica, inherited from the period of Colombian sovereignty, threatened to provoke war when Panamanian troops occupied disputed territory and armed clashes ensued (Feb.-Mar.). The United States government forced Panama to evacuate the area involved, which was then occupied by Costa Rica (Aug.).

Apr. 20. By the THOMSON-URRUTIA TREATY (p. 1050), Colombia recognized the independence of Panama.
The boundaries, hitherto disputed, were adjusted, diplomatic relations were established, and various accords were signed (1924-1925). TREATY WITH THE 1926, July 28. UNITED STATES, designed to protect the canal in time of war. It provided that Panama consider herself at war when the United States was belligerent, and that Panama permit peacetime maneuvers by American forces on Panamanian terri-Opposition by the Panamanian Assembly because of infringement of sovereignty prevented ratification (Jan. 26, The question of sovereignty over the Canal Zone then arose, Panama denying that the United States possessed such sovereignty. Panama virtually appealed to the League of Nations to determine the question, but the League took no action and the president of Panama disavowed the appeal.

1931. President Florencio Harmodio Arosemena was forced to resign as a result of revolution (Jan. 2). A military government was set up and 1932-1936. HARMODIO ARÍAS became president.

with President Arías conferred with President Roosevelt in Washington regarding the treaty relations between the two countries. The result was a declaration that Panama should be permitted all the commercial rights of a sovereign nation in the Canal Zone, and that there should be no American economic enterprise detrimental to Panama in the Canal Zone. The Panamanians having become more and more nationalistic, 1934-1935. Panama opened negotiations with the United States to secure modification of the Treaty of 1903, so as to eliminate the American guaranty of Panama's independence and the American right to intervene.

JUAN AROSEMENA, president. The negotiations with the United States finally eventuated in

Mar. 2. A new treaty with the United States which met many of the objections raised by Panama to the earlier treaty.

c. COSTA RICA

1917, Jan. 27. President Alfredo Gonzales Flores was overthrown by a military coup led by Federico Tinoco. The United States refused recognition to the new régime and

1919, May 6. Tinoco was deposed by the Flores party. American marines were landed (June 4) to protect American interests. After the Dec. 9. Election of Julio Acosta as president, the United States government granted recognition (1920).

1921. Conflict with Panama over the boundary (p. 1072).

1924-1928. Ricardo Jiménez, president. 1924, Dec. 24. Costa Rica withdrew from the League of Nations.

1928. Cleto Gonzáles Viquez, president.
1936- Léon Cortés Castro, president.

d. NICARAGUA

1914, Aug. 5. Conclusion of the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty with the United States, giving the latter the right to construct a canal across Nicaragua and lease sites for naval bases on both coasts. Costa Rica and Salvador at once protested against what they claimed was an infringement of their sovereignty.

1916, Apr. 13. The treaty was ratified by the United States, with the inclusion of a declaration that its provisions were not intended to affect the rights of other states.

1916-1921. EMILIANO CHAMORRO, president.

1917, Mar. 2. Salvador submitted the question of the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty to the Central American court of justice, which declared the treaty to be a violation of the treaties of 1907. Nicaragua ignored the decision and the efficacy of the court was thereby destroyed.

1917-1924. An American financial commission, in collaboration with the collector-general of customs, stabilized Nicaraguan finances.

1921-1923. Diego Chamorro, president.
 1923-1925. Martínez Bartolo, president.
 1925, Aug. 3. CÁRLOS SOLÓRZANO elected president. Like his predecessors he was a Conservative, but the new vice-president, Juan Sacasa, was a Liberal.

Oct. 25. A revolt, led by Emiliano Chamorro, forced Sacasa and other Liberals out of the government.

1926, Jan. 14. Solórzano resigned and Chamorro became president. The United States refused him recognition and when,

May 2. A Liberal insurrection was started by Gen. Agustino Sandino, the American government hastily landed forces. An armistice was effected by the United States (Sept. 23); Chamorro resigned and the Nicaraguan Congress elected

Nov. 11. Adolfo Diaz (Conservative) president. But

Dec. 2. Sacasa returned from exile in Mexico and set up a Liberal government of his own, which was recognized by Mexico. During the civil war which ensued, the United States government supported Díaz.

1927, May 4. Henry L. Stimson, representing the United States, succeeded in bringing the two factions together. President Díaz was to complete his term of office, the opposition was to disarm, and the United States was to supervise the forthcoming elections.

1928, Nov. 4. José Moncada (Liberal) was elected, the United States government supervising the polling. Sandino, who had been continuing the fighting on his own account and who had gone so far as to attack the American troops, withdrew to Mexico, but in 1931 resumed the struggle.

1933. The Sandino insurrection was suppressed. Sandino himself was killed (1934), but sporadic outbreaks of his followers continued for some years.

1933-1936. JUAN SACASA, president.

1936, June 2. Sacasa was deposed by the National Guard, led by Gen. Anastasio Somoza.

1937- ANASTASIO SOMOZA, president. He made himself virtually dictator and proceeded with the utmost vigor against communists and other radicals. The introduction of rigid exchange control was designed to help the country economically, but met with indifferent success.

1939, Mar. 23. A constituent assembly approved a new constitution and re-elected Somoza to the presidency.

e. HONDURAS

1916, Mar. Francisco Bertrand became president following a successful revolution.

1919, Aug. Insurrection of Rafael López
Gutiérrez, a Liberal. President Bertrand was obliged to flee, and American marines were landed (Sept. 11). Through American mediation a civil war was avoided

1920-1923. Gutiérrez became president.
When the elections of 1924 proved to be indecisive,

1924, Feb. 1. GUTIÉRREZ ESTABLISHED A DICTATORSHIP.

The Conservatives, under Tiburcio Caras, rose in revolt and marched on the capital. The United States severed relations with Gutiérrez and landed more troops. Gutiérrez was killed (Mar. 10), and

Mar. 31. The insurgents occupied the capital. By the Pact of Amapala (May 3), the civil war was ended. Vicente Tosta became provisional president and suppressed an attempt at further revolution by Gregorio Ferrara (Aug.—Oct.). A new constitution was then framed and 1925. MIGUEL PAZ BARAHONA became president, the United States forces having prevented revolutionary leaders from becoming candidates. The United States supported Barahona against further attempts at revolt by Ferrara.

 1928. Vicente Mejfa Colindres, president.
 1933. Gen. TIBURCIO CARIAS president. He assumed practically dictatorial powers.

1936, Apr. 15. The constitution was amended to enable the president to retain power until 1943. The growing unrest in the country led to numerous outbreaks and revolts.

1937, Jan.-Feb. A serious uprising, led by Gen. Justo Umana, was crushed. The government drove all opponents of the régime into flight or else imprisoned them.

f. SALVADOR

The recent history of Salvador has been much less spectacular than that of the neighboring states. The constitutional system operated without much friction until 1931, Dec. 2. A coup d'état enabled Maximiliano H. Martinez to make himself president.

1932. Martinez established a dictatorship.
Like near-by dictators, he devoted himself to the suppression of communism and other radical movements.

1937, Aug. 10. Salvador withdrew from the League of Nations.

1939, Jan. 20. A constitutional congress abrogated the constitution of 1886 and adopted a new régime.

g. GUATEMALA

1920, Apr. 8. ESTRADA CABRERA, president since 1898, was deposed by the Assembly because of his opposition to the scheme of Central American federation (p. 1072).

1920-1921. Cárlos Herrera, president. He was overthrown by a revolution (1921, Dec. 5) led by Gen. José Orellana, who rejected the Central American federation scheme.

1922-1926. Orellana, president.

1926-1930. Lázaro Chacón, president.

1930. Bautillo Palma, president. He was overthrown (Dec. 16) by Gen.

Manuel Orellana, who was not recognized by the United States and who soon resigned.

1930-1931. J. M. Andrade, president, until 1931GEN. JORGE UBICO made himself President-Diotator. He established close contact with the dictators of Honduras and Salvador for the suppression of all opposition.

1935. By "plebiscite" Ubico's term was extended until 1943.

13. MEXICO

The revolution that convulsed Mexico after the downfall of Díaz in 1911 (p. 822) had reduced the country to a state of utter confusion by 1914. Numerous leaders (Huerta, Carranza, Obregón, Villa, Zapata, etc.) held various parts of the territory, installing their own presidents, fighting each other, and creating difficulties with Mexico's neighbors.

1914, Apr. 9. A group of American marines was arrested at Tampico. The United States government demanded satisfaction (esp. a salute). On the refusal of Huerta to meet American demands, United States troops occupied Vera Cruz (Apr.

21). Huerta broke off relations with the United States. The major South-American states attempted to mediate, and Nov. 23 the American forces evacuated Vera Cruz.

July 5. Victoriano Huerta was elected president. He resigned almost at once (July 15), admittedly because of the refusal of the United States government to recognize him, which made his position impossible.

Aug. 15. Gen. Alvaro Obregón and a constitutionalist army took Mexico City and Venustiano Carranza became president. As yet the Constitutionalists controlled only part of the country. In the north Francisco Villa was practically dictator. He at once declared war on the Carranza régime, installing Eulalio Gutiérrez as president (deposed again Jan. 17, 1915). For a time Villa held Mexico City, but 1915, Jan. 27. Obregón recaptured the capital for the Constitutionalists.

Oct. 19. The United States government and a number of Latin-American states recognized Carranza as de facto president. Great Britain followed suit (Nov. 16).

1916, Mar. 9. Forces of Villa's party raided across the frontier into New Mexico. Thereupon American troops pursued him (Mar. 15). Carranza at once protested against the violation of Mexican territory and began to offer resistance. Clash of Americans and Mexicans at Carrizal (June 21). Ultimately conferences were arranged to arrive at some settlement. American troops departed Feb. 5, 1917.

THE NEW CONSTITU-1917, Jan. 31. TION was adopted by the Mexican Congress (promulgated Feb. 5). This instrument had been worked out by a constitutional convention, in session since Nov. 21. Representing advanced nationalist and radical social views, the Constitution of 1917 at once became the charter of the new Mexico. It provided for universal suffrage, the curbing of foreign ownership of lands, mines, and oil-fields, restriction of the power and property of the Church and monastic orders, the 8-hour day, a minimum wage, arbitration of labor disputes, agrarian reform (breakup of large estates and distribution among the landless), housing reform, etc.

Mar. 11. CARRANZA was elected president, for a 4-year term. By the constitution he was ineligible for re-election, in 1921.

1918, Feb. 19. By decree, oil was declared an inalienable national resource and a tax was levied on oil lands and contracts made before May 1, 1917. Titles to oil lands were to be transformed into concessions. American and British companies, supported by their governments, at once protested. For the time being the matter was settled by compromise, but, as it turned out, the episode was only the first move in a long campaign to break the power and wealth of foreign companies.

1918. Formation of the Confederation of Labor (Confederación Regional Obrera Mexicana, popularly called the CROM). This became possible under the new constitution. The confederation was the counterpart of the American Federation of Labor, and before long was to be challenged by a more radical organization. For the time being, however, it was an important factor in the furtherance of the constitutional and social reform movement.

(Adolfo de la Huerta, Alvaro Obregón, and Plutarco Elias Calles) joined forces against Carranza, who was accused of attempting to dictate the presidential succession. The opposition proclaimed the Republic of Sonora and took the field. May 8 Obregón took Mexico City and thereafter many of the cities on the east coast. Carranza was killed (May 21) and Villa surrendered to the victorious insurgents (July 27; he was endowed with a handsome estate, which he enjoyed until his assassination in 1023).

Sept. 5. OBREGÓN was elected president. He was recognized by the United States (Aug. 31, 1923) upon agreement to respect titles to land acquired before 1917 and to accept an adjustment of American claims.

1923, Dec. 6. Adolfo de la Huerta led a revolt against the government of Obregón and the latter's candidate for the presidency, Calles. The United States government supported Obregón, who was able to crush the insurrection (1924).

1924-1928. PLUTARCO CALLES, president. After a long and serious controversy with the United States regarding the application of the constitution to foreign properties, an adjustment was finally arrived at (1927, Calles-Morrow Agreement), due to the more conciliatory attitude of the United States government and the mission of Dwight Morrow as ambassador.

Calles continued the work of agrarian and educational reform initiated in 1917, but soon came into conflict with the Roman Catholic Church over the application of constitutional provisions.

1927, Feb. The Church publicly repudiated the Constitution of 1917, but the government (Feb. 11) ordered nationalization of Church property and began to close Church schools. Foreign priests, monks, and nuns were deported. The struggle thus begun has continued with but little interruption and has frequently led to open conflicts.

and soon covered a dozen provinces. Calles proved himself the strong man of Mexico by proceeding at once and with great vigor against the rebels. Within a couple of months most of the leaders had been defeated, captured, and executed.

1928, July 1. Obregón was re-elected president, but was assassinated a few weeks later (July 17). Thereupon as provisional president. Calles remained the real power in the government and put down another 1929, Mar.-Apr. Insurrection, provoked by political and religious discontent and led by Gens. Jesus María Aguirre and Gonzalo Escobar.

June 21. A compromise agreement was reached with the Church, which relieved the tension for the time being.

Aug. 11. Promulgation of an extensive labor code, in accordance with the Constitution of 1917: 8-hour day, 6-day week, right to strike, minimum wage, compulsory insurance, etc.

1930-1932. PASCUAL ORTIZ RUBIO, president. Calles remained the dominant figure, and the new administration simply continued the policy of its predecessors.

1931, Sept. 9. Mexico joined the League of Nations.

1932, Sept. 3. President Ortiz Rubio resigned after a difference with Calles, who had (1931) assumed the ministry of war.

1932-1934. Gen. Abelardo Rodríguez served as provisional president.

1933. Adoption of a Six-Year Plan of social legislation and economic development, which really signified a move toward the Right on the part of Calles and the National Revolutionary Party, in so far as it deferred some of the more extreme measures earlier envisaged.

GEN. LAZARO CÁR-1934, July 2. DENAS, the choice of Calles, was elected president after the constitution had been amended to extend the presidential term to six years. Conflict soon developed between Calles and the new president, who, though young, at once demonstrated a strong will-power. Representing the more advanced wing of the party, Cardenas regarded Calles as too conservative. In 1935 he forced Calles into exile and, on the latter's return to Mexico (1936), had him arrested and sent off to the United States. Thereafter Cárdenas, undisputed master of the country, embarked upon an accelerated program of reform, in which he was supported by the new Confederation of Mexican Workers (Feb. 1936), led by Vicente Lombardo Toledano, next to the president the most outstanding figure on the political scene. Within a couple of years as much land was expropriated as in the years 1917-1934. This was distributed to the peasants on the communal (cjido) basis. With regard to the Church, Cárdenas adopted a somewhat more conciliatory attitude, though he insisted on the elimination of the Church from politics and upheld the nationalization of Church property.

1936, Nov. 23. A new expropriation law empowered the government to seize private property when necessary for the "public or social welfare." Thereupon

1937, June 23. The National Railways of Mexico were taken over by the workers, and

Nov. 1. The sub-soil rights of the Standard Oil Company and other companies were declared nationalized. These steps inaugurated a new phase of the conflict with foreign interests. The federal labor board ordered American and British oil interests to increase the wages of workers by one-third, which the companies declared to be impossible.

1938, Jan. 19. A new tariff raised the rates from 100 to 200% on articles imported chiefly from the United States.

Mar. 1. The Mexican courts decided for the government and against 17 oil companies, in the wages dispute.

Mar. 18. THE GOVERNMENT TOOK OVER THE PROPERTIES OF
THE AMERICAN AND BRITISH OIL
COMPANIES, valued at $450,000,000.
The governments at once protested against such action. The United States government, securing no encouragement to hope for settlement, discontinued silver purchases from Mexico, as a retaliatory measure. The British government suspended diplomatic relations. The issue raised tremendous excitement throughout Mexico, the people vigorously supporting the government.

May-June. Cárdenas proceeded against Gen. Saturnino Cedillo, former minister of agriculture and "boss" of the province of San Luis Potosí, who was reported on the verge of revolt in the interest of conservative groups. The movement was easily broken.

July 21. The United States government proposed arbitration of claims against Mexico for expropriation of lands held by Americans (valued at $10,000,000). The American government did not dispute the right of Mexico to expropriate, but insisted on full compensation. The Mexican government refused both arbitration and compensation (except in very general statements). On the contrary, it proceeded to conclude Sept. 5. Oil barter agreements with Germany, Italy, and other nations, by which the oil should be exchanged for manufactured goods (previously imported chiefly from the United States and England). Nevertheless the United States government maintained a moderate attitude and showed great reluctance to abandon the "good neighbor" policy. Finally

Nov. 12. The United States and Mexico reached an agreement on the land question. Commissioners were to appraise the value of the properties and the Mexican government was to pay compensation at the rate of $1,000,000 per annum until the claims were liquidated. Repeated efforts to reach an agreement on the oil issue (spring, 1030) failed to produce results.

14. THE WEST INDIES

a. CUBA

1917, Apr. 7. Cuba declared war on Germany. The war period was one of great prosperity for the sugar industry, large quantities being shipped to the United States. But after the war the market collapsed with serious results for Cuba.

1920, Mar. 8. Cuba joined the League of Nations.

Nov. 1. Dr. Alfredo Zayas, candidate of the coalition National League, was elected by what his opponent, José Gómez (Liberal), declared to have been fraudulent methods. To prevent conflict the United States government sent Gen. Enoch Crowder, who arranged for new elections (1921, Mar. 15), which resulted in another victory for Zayas.

1921-1925. ALFREDO ZAYAS, president.
Crowder was withdrawn (1923) and the Cuban government gradually adopted a policy of opposition to American influence.

(Liberal), president. He attempted to solve the problems of the sugar industry by restricting production, stimulated industrial development (higher tariffs), and promoted public improvements and health. The term of the president was extended to six years and Machado was re-elected. He made himself virtually dictator, but thereby aroused much opposition which was enhanced by economic difficulties arising from the world depression.

was suppressed and various restrictive measures were introduced, but unrest and disorders continued (1931-1933). The United States had, at the outset, declared its intention not to intervene except in case of extreme anarchy. But it attempted to mediate, thereby arousing the resentment of Machado.

1933, Aug. 12. An army revolt forced Machado out of office. Cárlos Manuel de Céspedes became president, but disorder continued and the United States felt obliged to send warships to Cuba.

Sept. 5. Céspedes was driven from office by another army coup, led by Fulgencio Batista, who became practical dictator, though he eschewed political office.

Sept. 10. Grau San Martín became president and formed an extremely radical government, which was not recognized by the United States.

1934, Jan. 20. Overthrow of Grau San Martin. Carlos Mendieta became president and succeeded in concluding with the United States May 29. An agreement by which the

PLATT AMENDMENT (p. 823)
WAS ABROGATED and limitations on Cuban sovereignty were removed. Somewhat later (Aug. 24) the United States and Cuba signed a reciprocal trade agreement very favorable to the latter.

1935, Dec. 10. Mendieta resigned, and 1936, Jan. 10. Miguel Mariano Gómez was elected. Before the year was out,

Dec. 23. Gómez was forced from office by Batista, and 1936, Dec. 24-1940. FEDERICO LA-REDO BRU became president. Batista remained the real dictator, and his refgime, after 1933, embarked on a policy which apparently aimed at a corporative state along fascist lines. All political and social opposition was dealt with in drastic fashion. At the same time the government threw itself into radical social legislation and adopted (July 25, 1937) a Three-Year Plan which involved state control of the sugar and mining industries, the reorganization of agricultural schools, the distribution of land, etc. In 1940, Feb., a convention assembled to draft a new constitution which came into force Oct. 10, with General Fulgencio Batista as head of the government.

b. HAITI

1914-1915. Haiti was wracked by revolutionary movements, one president following another in rapid succession and the country in chaos. American marines were landed to protect foreigners and foreign property, and finally to supervise an election in the hope of re-establishing some measure of ordered government.

1915-1922. PHILIPPE DARTIGUENAVE, president. He concluded
Sept. 16. A TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES which gave the latter a practical protectorate. United States marines remained in occupation, and the United States government was given supervision of the customs offices and the power to organize a constabulary.

1918, June 19. A new constitution was introduced.

July 12. Haiti declared war on Germany.

1918-1919. A revolt directed against the American occupation and led by Charlemagne Perlate, caused much trouble, but was finally suppressed.

1920, June 30. Haiti joined the League of Nations.

1922-1930. LUIS BORNO, president. Opposition to his rule led to

1929, Dec. Serious disorders. Larger American forces were sent to the island, where they were attacked by the mobs. In view of the widespread anti-American feeling, the Washington government sent out

1980, Feb.-Mar. A commission of investigation, headed by W. Cameron Forbes. This commission recommended administrative reforms, the replacement of the military high commissioner by a civilian, and the continuation of the treaty relationship until 1936. It persuaded Borno to relinquish office, and

1930-1941 STENIO VINCENT became president. With American aid order was restored, finances and administration were reformed, public improvements introduced, and education was developed. At the same time a series of agreements were made providing for eventual termination of American control. These were blocked by the Haitian Assembly, which insisted on immediate withdrawal. After the advent of the Roosevelt administration in the United States arrangements were quickly made for complete termination of American control and liquidation of the Haitian foreign debt.

1934, Aug. 6. The American forces were withdrawn. After a plebiscite and under executive pressure, the Haitian Assembly approved the agreements with the United States, and adopted 1935, June 17. À new constitution, which endowed the president with wide executive powers. Vincent's term was extended to 1941.

1937, Oct. An acute crisis developed in relations between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, because of maltreatment of Haitians (p. 1079). The Vincent government sought a peaceful solution and requested the good offices of the United States, Mexico, and Cuba. An agreement was finally reached Jan. 31, 1938.

c. THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Chronic revolution and widespread disorder in Santo Domingo led to 1914, June 26. Intervention by the United States, which restored peace between the warring factions.

1916, May. Further outbreaks resulted in further intervention and

Nov. 29. PROCLAMATION OF AMERICAN MILITARY OCCU-

PATION. This step called forth opposition in the republic and in the United States also, with the result that from 1920 onward the American government sought to arrange for withdrawal.

1922, June 30. Agreement between the Dominican government and the United States. American rule ended Oct. 21 and the last marines were withdrawn Sept. 18, 1924. A provisional government was set up and 1924-1930. HORÀCIO VASQUEZ became president.

1924, Sept. 29. The Dominican Republic joined the League of Nations just as soon as the last American forces had left.

1929, Apr. An American commission, headed by Charles G. Dawes, at the request of the Dominican government investigated the finances and made recommendations.

1930, Feb. 23. President Vásquez was forced to resign as a result of a revolt.

1930-1938. RAFAEL LEONIDAS TRU-JILLO, president. He adopted a policy of social reform and public works, developing communications, introducing sanitation, encouraging agriculture, and distributing lands. Opposition to his rule was dealt with harshly, so that members of opposition parties were obliged to flee abroad.

1937. Oct. The Dominican government drove a large number of immigrant Haitians back over the border, killing many in the process. This led to protests and demands for reparation from the Haitian government, which invoked American conciliation treaties for settlement of the dispute. By this method an agreement was arrived at (Jan. 31, 1938).

1938, May 17. Jacinto B. Peynardo was elected president after Trujillo had announced his forthcoming retirement.

d. PUERTO RICO

1917, Mar. 2. THE JONES ACT, making Puerto Rico a territory and granting American citizenship to its inhabitants. Voting was made compulsory. Proportional representation was established by means of a "limited vote" for certain senators and representatives. It was further provided that United States internal revenue collections on the island should be paid into the Puerto Rican treasury. (Subsequently permission was accorded the island, practically, to collect United States income taxes for the benefit of the local treasury.) With such assistance, the budget of the insular government increased from about $2,000,-000 in 1901 to $11,000,000 in 1924. More than half of these funds were derived from what would normally be federal taxation.

May. The United States having declared war on Germany, the selective draft was extended to Puerto Rico by request of the insular government, after only two months of American citizenship. Some 18,000 men were inducted into service.

1918, June 2. The war, thus far rather distant, was suddenly brought home to the Puerto Ricans when a German submarine sank the Carolina near the end of her voyage from San Juan to New York.

Oct. 11, 24. A serious earthquake did much damage to towns on the west end of the island.

1924, Mar. A delegation, including Gov. Towner, came to the United States with the request that Puerto Rico be granted the rights of statehood without representation in Congress.

1928. The Puerto Rican legislature petitioned President Coolidge for the grant of autonomy without statehood. Autonomy was desired to provide homesteads for the peasantry, to free the island from American tariff restrictions, and to deal with the problem of absentee landlordism. President Coolidge replied, pointing out the advantages of American rule.

1930. Gov. Theodore Roosevelt was forced to appeal to Congress and to private philanthropy to aid the depressed population, of whom 60% were without employment.

1933. The Democratic administration in the United States took a much greater interest in the Puerto Rican situation and extended a large measure of relief, along lines followed in the United States itself. Nevertheless, there developed in the island an ever stronger demand for redefinition of status. Apart from a widespread sentiment in favor of statehood, there emerged a strong nationalist movement aiming at complete independence.

1936-1937. The Nationalists provoked demonstrations and riots, which in turn resulted in serious clashes with the police, arrest of many leaders, outbreaks of terrorism, etc.

1939, June 4. A committee of the legislature brought forth a demand for statehood and in the interval "demanded" an elective governor with power to appoint officials.

e. VIRGIN ISLANDS

AMERICAN-DANISH 1916, Aug. 4. TREATY, by which Denmark agreed to cede the Danish West Indies (about 100 islands with a total area of 132 square miles) to the United States for $25,000,000. The treaty was ratified Jan. 17, 1917, and formal possession was taken Mar. 31 of the same year. Danish laws were allowed to remain in effect.

The population (c. 26,000 in 1917) has suffered much from economic distress. The sugar industry of St. Croix had been in process of concentration and many small sugar mills had been abandoned. mately all grinding was done in three large "centrals." Many laborers were thereby thrown out of employment. The loss of the free port status, which had existed under Danish rule, reduced the trade of the islands, especially of St. Thomas. American prohibition law (1919) further destroyed the market for sugar products, though bay rum continued to be manu-The main achievement of the factured. American administration has been in the development of education. .

1924, Aug. 29-Sept. 1. Hurricanes damaged St. Thomas and St. John.

1931, Feb. After a succession of governors from the U.S. Navy, the United States established a civil government for the islands, making St. Thomas the capital. Paul M. Pearson became the first civil governor.

1931, Mar. The depression became so pronounced in the islands that President Hoover was able to refer to them as "an effective poorhouse" with 90% of the population dependent upon the bounty of the United States.

1933. The Roosevelt administration in the United States began to extend relief measures to the islands. Development of the tourist trade, expansion of the rum industry, etc., did much to ameliorate economic conditions.

1936, June 22. The Organic Act revised the political arrangements of government. The governor was to be assisted by a territorial legislative assembly, composed of the elected municipal councils of St. Thomas and St. Croix.

1938, Jan. 1. Universal suffrage went into effect under the new arrangements.

2. EGYPT AND THE SUDAN

- 1914, Dec. 18. Egypt proclaimed a British protectorate.
- Dec. 19. Khedive Abbas Hilmi deposed. 1914-1917. SULTAN HUSSEIN KAMIL, uncle of Abbas.
- 1917, Oct. 9. Death of the sultan.
- 1917-1936. AHMED FUAD, brother of Hussein Kamil, became sultan, then king.
- 1919, Mar. 8. Saad Zaghlul Pasha and other Nationalist leaders, deported to Malta to prevent their going to the Paris peace conference. The Nationalist Party (Wafd) had grown tremendously during the war as a result of Egyptian resentment at British methods (forced labor conscription, requisition of materials, etc.). Its program was one of independence. The deportation of Zaghlul was followed by a serious national insurrection, which had to be put down by the British military under Field Marshal Allenby.

- Oct. 17. Allenby appointed high commissioner for Egypt.
- Dec. 7.-Mar. 6, 1920. Milner Commission to inquire into the disorders and suggest the future organization of Egypt.
- 1920, Mar. 10. A legislative assembly passed a resolution in favor of independence.
 - June 7-Nov. 9. Negotiations of Zaghlul and Milner, at London.
- 1921, Feb. 28. Publication of the Milner report, proposing independence with guaranties for British interests.
 - Apr. 5. Return of Zaghlul to Egypt.
 Attacks of the Nationalists on the government.
 - May. Numerous outbreaks against foreigners, in which many persons were killed.

July 12-Nov. 20. Further negotiations at London, conducted by the Egyptian premier, Adli Pasha. These broke down on the question of the retention of British troops in Egypt.

Dec. 22. Zaghlul and other Nationalists again deported.

1922, Jan. 23. The Wafd proclaimed a policy of passive resistance.

Feb. 28. TERMINATION OF THE PROTECTORATE by unilateral action on the part of Britain. Egypt declared independent, but the decision on security of communications, defense, protection of foreigners, and the future of the Sudan reserved for further negotiation.

Mar. 15. Fuad I assumed the title of king.

1923, Apr. 4. Zaghlul released by the British.

Apr. 19. PROMULGATION OF THE CONSTITUTION: it provided for a senate and a chamber, three-fifths of the former and the whole of the latter to be elected by universal suffrage; ministers to be responsible to the Chamber alone.

Sept. 27. Great victory of the Wafd in the elections.

1924, Jan. 28. Saad Zaghlul, premier.

June 24-25. Widespread anti-British riots.

Sept. 25-Oct. 3. Conferences between Zaghlul and Ramsay MacDonald failed to produce an agreement on the reserved questions.

Nov. 20. Death of Sir Lee Stack, sirdar of the Egyptian army and governor-general of the Sudan, assassinated by a fanatic. The Egyptian government at once expressed regret and promised punishment of those responsible.

Nov. 22. BRITISH ULTIMATUM, demanding punishment, apology, indemnity, suppression of political demonstrations, and withdrawal of Egyptian forces from the Sudan. Zaghlul agreed to these terms, excepting those relating to the Sudan. When the British insisted, he resigned in protest. His successor yielded (Nov. 24).

1925, Feb. 26. Sir George Lloyd, high commissioner.

Mar. 12. The Wafd again victorious in the elections; Zaghlul became president of the Chamber. The Nationalists blocked all measures of the government, which repeatedly dissolved the Parliament only to find a new Nationalist majority at the new elections.

1926, Jan. 21. Opening of the Makwar (Senaar) Dam, an important stage in the utilization of the Nile water. The Egyptians were much exercised by the development of cultivation in the Sudan, which might deprive Egypt of necessary water.

1927, Apr. 18. Sarwat Pasha, premier.

July 18. New draft treaty with Great Britain, envisaging British military occupation for 10 years.

Aug. 23. Death of Zaghiul Pasha; Mustafa Nahas Pasha became leader of the Wafd.

Oct. 30-Nov. 8. Further negotiations in London regarding the draft treaty.

1928, Mar. 4. The Egyptian Parliament rejected the British draft as incompatible with Egyptian independence.

Mar. 16. Nahas Pasha, premier.

Apr. 29. British ultimatum, forcing the Egyptian government to give up a bill providing for freedom of public assembly.

June 25. Dismissal of Nahas Pasha; Mohammed Mahmud (Liberal) became premier.

July 19. Parliament dissolved for three years; freedom of press and assembly suspended.

1929, Mar. 8-May 1. Resumption of discussions at London, the Egyptians hoping for concessions from the Labor government.

May 7. Agreement on Nile water: only Blue Nile water to be used for the Sudan, the water of the White Nile being reserved to Egypt.

Aug. 6. New draft treaty with England:
British occupation to be replaced by a military alliance and British troops to be restricted to a few points on the Suez Canal; Egypt to join the League of Nations;
the Sudan to be returned to an AngloEgyptian condominium.

Aug. 8. Sir Percy Loraine, high commissioner.

Oct. 31. Restoration of the constitution.

Dec. 21. The Wafd again swept to victory in the elections.

1930, Jan. 1. Nahas Pasha premier again. Mar. 27-May 8. Negotiations in London regarding the British draft. These broke down chiefly on the issue of the Sudan.

June 21. ISMAIL SIDKY PASHA, premier. He was the appointee of the king, who chose him as an able administrator to deal with grave internal problems arising from the general world depression. The settlement with England was to be postponed, until the Wafd Party could be weakened.

June 26. The Wafd adopted a policy of non-co-operation with the government and advocated non-payment of taxes. Nationalist outbreaks became common throughout the country.

Oct. 22. INTRODUCTION OF A NEW CONSTITUTION: the Senate to be three-fifths appointive; elections to the Chamber to be indirect. Loud Nationalist protests and riots. Union of the Liberal Constitutional Party with the Wafd in common opposition to the king and Sidky.

Dec. 8. Sidky Pasha organized a party of his own, the People's Party.

1931, Apr. 22. Treaty of friendship between Egypt and Iraq, the first link in the chain binding Egypt to the other Arab states in a community of attitude on subjects touching the Arab world.

May. Elections. Through prohibition of Wafd meetings and other repressive measures, the government party won a victory.

1933, June. Anti-missionary and anti-Christian outbreaks; formation of the Committee for the Defense of Islam.

Sept. 21. Sidky obliged to resign because of ill health. After the failure of a "palace" cabinet, the king accepted a

1934, Nov. Cabinet of Mohammed Tewfik Nessim, who attempted a policy of reconciliation and allowed Wafd activity. He insisted on the Nov. 30. Suspension of the Constitution of 1930. Agitation of the Nationalists for restoration of the Constitution of 1923. This was not done, on British advice.

1935, Nov. Ethiopian crisis. This was made the occasion of a violent outbreak of Nationalist agitation (Nov. 13-Dec. 2) and a union of parties, designed to extract concessions from the British in their hour of need.

Dec. 12. RESTORATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF 1923, long demanded by the Nationalists.

1936, Jan. 22. Cabinet of Ali Maher Pasha, a non-partisan government designed to put the revived constitution into effect.

Apr. 28. Death of King Fuad.

1936FAROUK (b. 1920), king. His advent brought to an end the constant danger of usurpation of power by the king. The new ruler, simple and attractive, at once attained widespread popularity.

May 2. In the elections the Nationalists won a great victory. A new Wafd cabinet was at once (May 10) formed under Nahas Pasha. This government negotiated the Aug. 26. TREATY BETWEEN EGYPT AND ENGLAND. The British were to withdraw their forces, excepting for 10,000 men, to be restricted to the Suez Canal zone (in time of war the number might be increased); England to maintain a naval base at Alexandria for not more than 8 years; unrestricted immigration of Egyptians into the Sudan to be permitted; Egyptian troops to return to the Sudan; abolition of capitulations in Egypt envisaged; Egypt to become a member of the League of Nations; treaty of alliance between England and Egypt for 20 years, after which the agreement was to be reexamined.

Dec. 22. Ratification of the treaty by the Egyptian Parliament, despite criticism from several groups.

1937, Jan. 13. A British military mission arrived to advise the Egyptian government on the building-up of an army. In 1938 universal military training was introduced.

Apr. 12-May 8. Conference of Montreux between the powers enjoying capitulatory rights in Egypt. Agreement to abolish the capitulations, but to maintain the mixed courts for 12 years and extend their authority to criminal cases (hitherto handled by consular courts).

May 26. Egypt was admitted to the League of Nations at a special session.

Dec. 30. King Farouk dismissed the Nahas cabinet, after considerable friction, and appointed Mohammed Mahmud Pasha, leader of the Liberal Constitutional Party, as premier. The Wafd Party, which for years had lived on the Anglo-Egyptian antagonism, began to disintegrate as soon as a settlement had been reached. Opposition to Nahas within the party led to the withdrawal of a number of influential leaders and to the exclusion of others.

1938, Feb. 2. The king dissolved the Parliament, in which the Wafd Party still had a large majority.

Mar. 31-Apr. 2. In the elections the government party won a tremendous victory, Nahas not even winning a seat. Complete eclipse of the old Wafd Party. In June the premier reorganized his cabinet to admit a number of dissident Nationalists.

Nov. 19. In view of the international tension, the government embarked upon an extensive program of armament (air force, navy, munitions factories, etc.).

3. ETHIOPIA

1916-1930. ZAUDITU, empress. Her reign was marked by great instability and particularly by the growing antagonism between the Conservative, Church groups, led by the war minister, Hapta Giorgis, and the Liberal, westernizing party, led by the regent, Ras Tafari, who, as governor of Harrar, was building up a reliable force and introducing many improvements.

1919. Following the First World War, the Italian government proposed to the British a scheme for cooperation in the exploitation of Ethiopia; this was evaded by the British.

1921, Jan. Capture of Lij Yasu in Tigré. He was handed over to the custody of Ras Kassa, the powerful governor of the province.

1923, Sept. 28. ETHIOPIA WAS AD-MITTED TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. England had opposed the admission but it had been advocated by Italy and France, and Ethiopia was ready to accept the international arms traffic convention and to take steps against slavery.

1924. Slavery was officially abolished.

Ras Tafari paid a prolonged visit to Europe, but evaded definite commitments, especially to England in the matter of building a dam at Lake Tsana.

1925, Dec. 14, 20. Exchange of notes between England and Italy, the British promising aid to Italy in the development of her sphere of influence in return for Italian support of British efforts to secure a dam at Lake Tsana.

1926, June 19. Protest of the Ethiopian government against the Anglo-Italian notes. Both sides gave assurances.

1928, Aug. 2. Conclusion of a treaty of friendship with Italy for 20 years: Ethiopia was to get a free zone at Assab and a road was to be jointly built and operated from Assab to Dessié.

Oct. 7. Ras Tafari became king (negus) following the death of Hapta Giorgis. Tafari thenceforth exercised the dominant influence and began to initiate his policy of modernization.

1929. A Belgian military commission was appointed to reorganize the army.

1930, Mar. 1. The negus granted a concession for a dam at Lake Tsana to the American J. G. White Corporation, which had the support of the British and Egyptian governments.

Mar. 31. A dangerous revolt of Ras Gugsa, the husband of Zauditu, was put down by Tafari, using the new methods.

Apr. 2. Death of the Empress Zauditu.

Nov. 2. Coronation of Ras Tafari as king of kings with the title of 1930-1936. HATLE SELASSIE I.

1931, July 16. Haile Selassie introduced a constitution providing for a parliament chosen by the provincial governments. This was part of his policy of governmental reorganization: appointment of younger men who had visited Europe to important governorships; establishment of schools; progressive measures to end slavery, etc.

1932. Rising of Ras Hailu of Gojjam.
This was effectively suppressed.

1934, Dec. 5. Clash of Ethiopian and Italian forces at Ualual, in a disputed zone on the frontier of Italian Somaliland. The Italians demanded apology and reparation; the Ethiopian government insisted on an investigation of responsibilities.

1935, Jan. 7. Franco-Italian Agreement, including a cession of part of French Somaliland to Italy and the sale to Italy of shares in the Ethiopian railway.

Feb. Italy began to send troops to East Africa.

May. The council of the League of Nations arranged for an arbitral tribunal to deal with the Ualual dispute.

July. The tribunal having been unable to agree on procedure, the League arranged for a fifth arbitrator, but only to establish responsibility for the clash, not to determine the possession of Ualual.

Aug. 16. After a meeting of British,
French, and Italian delegates at Paris, Italy was offered wide opportunities for the development of Ethiopia, subject to Ethiopian agreement. These offers were rejected, and it became more and more evident that Italy was bent on conquest.

Sept. 3. The arbitral board reported neither side to blame in the Ualual incident, since each side regarded the place as within its territory.

1086 AFRICA

Oct. 3. BEGINNING OF THE ITALIAN INVASION OF ETHIOPIA.

Oct. 7. The League Council declared Italy the aggressor.

Oct. 11. The League Assembly voted to impose sanctions on Italy (for international aspects of the crisis, see p. 063).

Nov. 18. Sanctions were put into effect.

In the meanwhile the Italians advanced slowly in the north and south. The Ethiopians wisely avoided a pitched battle, but finally, in the spring of 1936, the Italians brought into full play their air power and began the use of poison gas. Unable to cope with these methods the valiant Ethiopian defense broke down.

1936, May 5. The Italians occupied Addis Ababa, the emperor having fled to the coast and thence to Palestine and England.

May 9. ETHIOPIA WAS FORMALLY ANNEXED TO ITALY, and, with Eritrea and Italian Somaliland, was organized as Italian East Africa. The King of Italy assumed the title Emperor of Ethiopia. The conquest was recognized by Italy's friends (Germany, Austria, and Hungary), but only after considerable delay by some of the other powers (England, France, 1938).

Pacification of Ethiopia. The Italians established posts and forts throughout the occupied territory, linking them up by roads. The great and immediate problem, however, was to defeat what native forces remained in the field and to disarm the Ethiopians. Isolated attacks on the Italians continued and 1937, Feb. 19. An attempt was made to assassinate the viceroy, Gen. Graziani, at Addis Ababa. He and a number of his staff were wounded. Wholesale arrests and executions in the capital, designed to intimidate the population.

Feb. 21. Ras Desta Demtu, the most formidable opponent of the Italians, was defeated outside the capital, and captured (executed Feb. 24).

4. NORTH AFRICA

(Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya)

1919, Feb. 4. In Algeria French citizenship was extended to all those who had served in the World War, to those who owned land, to literates, etc.

May 17. Civil government was re-established in Libya, which was divided into Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. Citizenship was granted to natives and a system of self-government with elected assemblies was established (July-Nov.).

July 11. Beginning of the attacks of Raisuli upon the Spanish possessions in Morocco.

Sept. 12. A Franco-Italian agreement led to the cession of several important oases in southeast Tunisia to Italy; Italian nationals were given the same status as Frenchmen in Tunisia.

1920, Oct. 25. The Italian government recognized Sheikh Sidi Idriss as head of the Senussi, with wide authority over Kufra and other oases.

in which a large Spanish force under Gen. Silvestre was destroyed by the Riff leader, Abd el-Krim. Fighting between the Spaniards and the Riffs became chronic, the Spaniards suffering heavy losses.

Nov. 8. A new nationality law decreed that children of foreign parents, if the latter were born in Tunisia, should be French subjects. Great Britain protested against this law and brought the matter before the permanent court, which found that the French legislation went beyond ordinary national powers. A Franco-British agreement (May 24, 1923) provided that the children in question might elect their nationality, but that the same should not hold for their own children.

1922, May 22. Gen. Badoglio began the offensive against the Arabs in Libya. The operations dragged on for years, though pressed more insistently after Mussolini's rise to power. By 1930 the conquest of the country by the Italians was at last completed.

July 13. Reorganization of the government of Tunisia, where the Young Tunisians (nationalists) had developed an extensive agitation for self-government. A complicated system of councils, composed of French and natives, was organized, but was given power only in economic matters.

Sept. 28. Submission of Raisuli; end of the war in the western part of the Spanish zone.

1923, Dec. 18. Tangier Convention signed by Spain, France, and Great Britain, after long conferences at London (July-Oct.) and at Paris. Tangier was to be governed for the sultan by a mixed commission, on which the French had the major influence.

1924, Dec. After repeated reverses, the Spaniards were obliged to withdraw from the interior and concentrate on the coast.

Abd el-Krim captured 1925, Jan. 27. Raisuli, who died soon afterward.

Apr. 13. Abd el-Krim began to attack the French, who were busy subduing the regions on the Rissian frontier.

July 26. A Franco-Spanish agreement provided for full co-operation against Abd el-Krim. The French gradually concentrated an army of 150,000 men against the Riffians.

Sept. 9. Under command of Marshal Pétain, the French and Spanish began a major offensive, driving back the Riffians.

Sept. 24. Resignation of Lyautey as French resident, after a long and brilliant career as pacifier of Mo-POCCO.

Dec. 6. An Anglo-Italian agreement (the Milner-Schialoja Agreement) provided for the cession of the Jarabub Oasis and other parts of western Egypt to Italy.

1926, Apr. Conferences between the French and Abd el-Krim led to no result.

May 7. Opening of a new France-Spanish offensive.

May 26. ABD EL-KRIM SURREN-DERED. He was exiled to the island of Réunion and the Riffian war came to an end.

1927, Mar. 9. The system of self-government in Libya was revoked.

Nov. 17. Death of Mulai Yusuf, Sultan of Morocco. He was succeeded by his son, Sidi Mohammed III.

The Senussi leader in Cy-1926, Jan. 3. renaica surrendered, bringing to an end the war in eastern Libya.

July 25. The Tangier Statute was revised and Spain given somewhat larger measure of control. Italy became a signatury of the convention.

1929, Jan. 24. Tripoli and Cyrenaica were once more united under one gov-

1930. The world economic orisis made itself acutely felt in North Africa, Morocco in particular suffering from drought, locusts, and general falling-off of the demand for phosphate. Despite relief offered by the French government in various forms, the prevalent distress led to rapid spread of native unrest.

1931, Oct. Founding of a League of Ulemas at Constantine, Algeria. The purpose of this was to further the work of Moslem reform as outlined by the Moslem Congress at Jerusalem. It marked the extension of the new Moslem-Arab renaissance (already widespread in Tunisia) to Algeria.

Dec. 29. Spanish Morocco was reorganized under a high commissioner with civil and military authority. The establishment of the republic in Spain created much ferment in Spanish Morocco.

1932-1934. Completion of the pacification of French Morocco.

of French Morocco. Jan. 15, 1932, the French occupied the oasis of Tablet, headquarters of the restless tribes-With the submission of the Atlas and Anti-Atlas regions, the conquest was completed.

1933, Nov. 28. Opening of the Moroccan-Tunisian railway, which united the French possessions and which, in time of war, would enable the government to send troops from Tunisia to Moroccan Atlantic ports and thus obviate the dangerous Mediterranean route.

1934, Jan. 1. Libya was divided into four provinces (Tripoli, Misurata, Bengasi, and Derna).

Violent attacks upon the Jews at Aug. Constantine and in other Algerian towns. Anti-Semitism was one of the main planks in the program of the Arab nationalists.

Nov. A group of young Moroccans, many of them educated in Europe, presented a Plan of Moroccan Reforms which may be taken as marking the birth of Moroccan nationalism, as distinct from the tribal opposition to foreign rule. Moroccan nationalists drew much of their inspiration from Egypt and the Near East generally, and were deeply influenced by the developments in Iraq and by the Wafd struggle in Egypt.

1935, Nov. 13. An accord between France and Spain regarding Tangier provided that the chief administrator and the bishop should be Spaniards. Owing to the outbreak of the Spanish civil war these arrangements had to be deferred.

1986. The electoral victory of the Left parties in Spain and France (Feb. and May) served as a great stimulus to radicalism and nationalism throughout North Africa. At the same time the French colonists, alarmed by concessions made by the home government to the lower classes, became extremely hostile to the Popular Front in France.

July 18. The Spanish civil war (p. 983) broke out when the Spanish troops in Morocco (under Gen. Francisco Franco) rebelled and seized Melilla. Throughout the war the Moroccan troops (Riffs, drafted by Franco) played an important part in the campaigns in Spain. In the meanwhile the coastal towns were repeatedly bombarded by Spanish Loyalist air forces.

Acute tension resulted from 1937, Jan. rumors of the landing of German forces in Spanish Morocco. On demand, the German government gave ample assurances, but there seemed no doubt that German experts were busy fortifying the region, exploiting the mines, etc.

Mar. A Loyalist uprising in Spanish Morocco was put down with great firmness.

Spectacular visit of Mussolini to Mar. Libya, where he opened a great new military road running the entire length of the colony. Mussolini proclaimed protector of Islam and presented with a sword of Islam. There remained no room for doubt that the Italians were doing their utmost to encourage the Arab and Moslem movement throughout the Near East and North Africa, as a convenient method of embarrassing the British and French governments.

Sept.-Oct. Nationalist uprising in Mo-The French government rocco. rushed troops and airplanes and snuffed out the movement as quickly as possible. Many nationalist leaders were arrested. Albert Sarraut, eminent French colonial administrator, was appointed to head a new Commission of Co-ordination for North Africa with the objective of strengthening the French position in all this region. 1938, Dec. Tunisia began to focus world attention after vociferous demonstrations in the Italian Chamber and throughout Italy calling for cession of Tunisia and Corsica to Italy. The French government and nation were united in uncompromising opposition to any such concession, and 1939, Jan. The French premier, M. Daladier, paid a visit to Corsica and Tunis. His enthusiastic reception in North Africa appeared to demonstrate that the Arabs, whatever their grievances against France, had no desire to exchange French rule for Italian. Tension between France and Italy continued as the French government flatly declined to discuss any cession of French territory.

WEST AFRICA AND THE SUDAN

The partition of Africa having been completed before the First World War, the period after the war was devoted to the consolidation of European rule and the organization of the administration. In most of the French and British colonies some form of representative government (councils, predominantly composed of officials, but with representation of economic and native groups) was established and the inhabitants were given some control over eco-Consistent efforts were nomic affairs. made to put an end to slavery, to introduce primary and vocational education for the natives, to organize justice and to further economic development. Railroads were built in most colonies and motor roads were opened. In accordance with international agreements, the import of "trade spirits" (i.e. liquors not usually consumed by Europeans) and of arms and munitions was prohibited. Land legislation aimed at the prevention of a landless native proletariat.

1916, Mar. 4. An Anglo-French agreement defined respective spheres in the conquered Cameroons and Togoland. France was assigned by far the larger part.

June 10. The laws of Nigeria were applied to British Cameroons.

Aug. 21. The French part of Togoland was attached to French West 1917, July 8. French Cameroons was attached to French Equatorial Africa.

Aug. 4. Liberia declared war on Ger-

1919, Mar. 1. The French organized a separate colony of the Upper Volta.

The supreme council assigned the German Cameroons and Togoland as mandates to Great Britain and France. This was confirmed by the League of Nations (July 20, 1922).

July 10. England and France made an agreement defining the frontier of their mandates in the Cameroons.

July 30. Conscription was introduced in the French West Africa.

1920, June 30. Liberia became a member of the League of Nations.

Dec. 4. The name of the French colony Upper Senegal-Niger was changed to the French Sudan. A superior council (partly elective) was created for French West Africa.

- 1921, Jan. 1. Mauretania was created a French colony.
 - Oct. 13. The French created a separate colony of the Niger.
 - Nov. 21. Establishment of the legislative council in Nigeria.
- 1923, Oct. 11. British Togoland was put under the government of the Gold Coast.
- 1924, Jan. 21. An Anglo-French agreement definitively fixed the frontier between the French Sudan and the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan.
- June 19 (1925, Sept. 16). Agreement between the Liberian government and the Firestone Rubber Plantation Company provided for the lease to the company of one million acres of land for 99 years, and for a loan by the company of $5,000,000 (for 40 years at 7%).
 - Oct. 21. The city of Dakar (capital of French West Africa) was made an autonomous area, directly under the governor-general.
 - Nov. 25. Establishment of a legislative council in Sierra Leone.

- 1925, May 23. Establishment of a legislative council in the Gold Coast.
- 1927, Sept. 22. Slavery declared abolished in Sierra Leone.
- 1930, Mar. 8. A joint American-League of Nations investigation (Johnson-Christy Commission) to Liberia investigated the conditions of native labor and reported (Sept. 8) that slavery actually existed.
- 1932, Dec. 23. Liberia was forced to suspend payment of interest and amortization of the Firestone debt, which in 1931 had absorbed 55% of the revenue.
- 1935, June. The Liberian Legislature ratified an agreement with American interests, by which interest on the 1926 loan was reduced to 5% and all payments were made dependent on the state of revenue. The United States government resumed diplomatic relations with Liberia (broken off in 1930), and the British government followed suit (1936). Rapid development of the Firestone plantations secured the government greater revenue and enabled it to resume interest and amortization payments.

6. THE CONGO REGION

(French Equatorial Africa, Spanish Guinea, Belgian Congo, Angola)

- 1914-1918. Troops of the Belgian Congo assisted the British and French colonial forces in the defense of Rhodesia and the conquest of the Cameroons.
- 1916. Belgian forces occupied the districts of Ruanda and Urundi, part of German East Africa. Other German posts on the shores of Lake Tanganyika were taken, including Tabora (Sept. 19).
- 1919, May 30. An Anglo-Belgian agreement assigned Ruanda and Urundi to Belgium as a prospective mandate, but without the district of Kisaka. This was conceded to Belgium by agreement of Aug. 3, 1923, after which Belgium accepted the mandate (Oct. 20, 1924). The mandated territory was united administratively with the Belgian Congo (Aug. 21, 1925).
 - June 28. By the Treaty of Versailles, Germany retroceded to France that part of the French Congo (French Equatorial Africa), which had been ceded to Germany by the Agreement of Nov. 4, 1911.
- 1921-1924. Administration of Gen. Norton de Mattos in Angola. He at- tempted to open up the country by improved communications and other methods of encouragement, but met with great financial difficulties.

- 1921, Aug. 21. The Belgian government voted a credit of 300,000,000 francs for the development of the Belgian Congo through the construction of railways, etc.
- 1922, July 6. The Belgian Congo was given a wide measure of autonomy, with a system of administrative decentralization. Town government was introduced Jan. 12, 1923.
- 1924. An Anglo-French agreement defined the frontier between French Equatorial Africa and the Sudan (Wadai and Darfur).
- 1926, July 1. An Anglo-Portuguese agreement defined the frontier between Angola and Southwest Africa at the Kunene River.
- 1927, July 27. By an agreement between Portugal and Belgium, the latter ceded to the former 480 square miles on the southwest frontier of the Congo in return for I square mile of territory near Matadi, the Congo and formally opened the new railway from the Katanga Province to the Kassai River (Bukama-Ilebo), providing direct communication by rail and water between Leopoldville and the rich Katanga copper mines.

1931, July 1. Opening of the Benguella-Katanga Railway, from Lobito Bay on the Angola coast to Katanga in the Belgian Congo, thus completing the first trans-African railway (Benguella-Beira, via Katanga and northern Rhodesia).

1934, May. Angola was reorganized, with division into five provinces.

June 18. Opening of the air line from Algiers to Brazzaville, by way of Fort Archambault.

July 10. Opening of the railway from Brazzaville to the coast at Pointe Noire.

1935, Apr. 16. Spanish Guinea (Rio Muni) was divided, Fernando Po being given separate administration.

7. EAST AFRICA

(Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Nyasaland, Mozambique)

1919, May 7. The supreme council assigned German East Africa to Great Britain.

July 22. By ordinance the legislative council of British East Africa was enlarged to 11 elected members for the Europeans, 2 nominated members for the Asiatics (Anglo-Indians), and 1 for the Arabs. A majority to support the governor was assured by the appointment of sufficient official members.

Sept. 23. The supreme council assigned the Kionga Triangle (part of German East Africa) to Portugal.

1920, Jan. 10. THE BRITISH MANDATE OVER GERMAN EAST AFRICA went into effect. The name of the territory was changed to Tanganyika; the German settlers were sent home and their estates were sold.

July 23. British East Africa was renamed Kenya and was made into a crown colony. The coastal strip, leased from the Sultan of Zanzibar in 1887, became the Kenya Protectorate.

June 5. A nominated legislative council was established in Uganda.

1922, July 1. Opening of the railway from Beira to the south bank of the Zambezi, thus connecting Nyasaland with a good port.

1924, Jan. 4. In the Kenya the Indian element was given 5 seats in the legislative council (as against the previous 2) and the right to elect them by the communal system.

July 15. An Anglo-Italian agreement provided for the cession of Italy of a strip of territory from 50 to 100 miles wide on the British side of the Juba River, in fulfillment of the provisions of the Treaty of London of 1915 (p. 925). The cession was actually made June 20, 1925.

1925, Jan. 1. New immigration regulations for Tanganyika permitted the return of German settlers.

1926. A conference of East African governors, at Nairobi, discussed the possibility of an East African federation, much desired by the white settlers of Kenya. The idea has been frequently bruited since that time, but has met with staunch opposition from Zanzibar.

Mar. 19. A nominated legislative council was established for Tanganyika.

1928, Jan. 11. Opening of the Nakuru-Mbulamuti-Jinja railway line in Kenya, giving access to some of the most valuable territory for white settlement.

Feb. 13. Junction of the railway lines from the Katanga and from Beira, provided an outlet to the east for the rich mineral resources of Katanga.

Aug. 15. Opening of the railway line from Tabora (in Tanganyika) to Mwanza on the south shore of Lake Victoria.

Sept. 11. An important convention between Portugal and the South African Union regulated questions of transportation from the Transvaal to the coast, problems of labor recruitment, etc.

1929, Jan. 18. The Hilton-Young Commission recommended closer union of the East African and Central African colonies.

1934, Mar. The organization of the legislative council for Kenya was modified in the interest of broader representation.

1935, Jan. 14. Opening of the Lower Zambezi bridge (12,064 feet long and one of the longest bridges in the world), providing for uninterrupted rail connection between Beira and Nyasaland.

Sept. 10. A "parliament" of white settlers in Kenya met and denounced the government policy, especially on its financial side, and demanded closer union of Kenya, Uganda, and Tanganyika (rejected by a British parliamentary committee in 1931 as inopportune).

Oct. 7. The colonial office announced the appointment of Sir Alan W. Pym to inquire into the financial problems of the colony.

8. SOUTH AFRICA AND SOUTHWEST AFRICA

1919, Apr. Gen. Hertzog and a delegation of his Nationalist Party appeared at the Paris Peace Conference and asked for the recognition of complete independence for South Africa. During the war the party had become more and more pronounced in its secessionist and republican views. Since Hertzog represented a minority party in South Africa, nothing was done about the petition.

May 7. The supreme council of the Allied Powers assigned German Southwest Africa as a mandate to the South African Union. Botha had tried hard, but in vain, to have it ceded outright.

Aug. 28. Death of Gen. Botha. He was succeeded as prime minister and leader of the South African Party by Gen. Smuts.

1920, Mar. 10. In the elections the Nationalist Party won the largest number of seats (45, as against 40 for the South African Party, 25 for the Unionists, and 21 for the Labor Party). The Unionists now began to support the South African Party but the Laborites tended to join the Nationalists, thus creating a most delicate balance.

July 28. A native affairs commission was set up and the council system was extended to all native reservations. But the native question continued to be a burning one, partly because the reservations were wholly inadequate and partly because a very large part of the native population had become detribalized and settled as laborers on the farms of the whites, or as mine and industrial workers in the larger towns.

1921, Feb. 8. In new elections the South African Party (with which the Unionists had merged) secured 76 seats, as against 47 for the Nationalists and 10 for Labor.

1922, Jan.-Mar. A great strike movement on the Rand led to much radicalism and many serious outbreaks. Some 230 persons were killed in the disturbances.

Oct. 27. A popular referendum in Southern Rhodesia resulted in a heavy vote against joining the Union of South Africa, despite very attractive terms offered by Smuts. The English population of Rhodesia was evidently distrustful of the rising tide of Boer nationalism in the Union.

1923, July 25. The claims of the South Africa Company in Southern Rhodesia were finally settled along the lines laid down by the Cave Commission report (Jan. 1921). The British government agreed to a money payment, and the company thereupon resigned its administrative privileges.

Sept. 1. SOUTHERN RHODESIA BE-CAME A CROWN COLONY, with a system of responsible government.

abandoned its administrative powers in Northern Rhodesia, which also became a crown colony, but without responsible government.

June 17. ELECTIONS: victory of a coalition of the Nationalists and the Labor Party (resentful of the government's labor policy on the Rand and of the association of Botha's party with the Unionist mineowners) over the South African Party (53 seats as against 63 for the Nationalists and 18 for Labor).

June 30. Gen. Hertzog, leader of the Nationalists, became prime minister. In return for the support of the Labor Party he was, however, obliged to shelve the projects of secession and republicanism. The definition of Dominion status as laid down by the Imperial Conference of 1926 served further to meet the claims of the Nationalists.

1925, July 27. German Southwest Africa was given a constitution, providing for a legislative assembly. The German population became British citizens, but German was recognized as an official language.

1927, Feb. 21. A conference with representatives of the government of India finally led to arrangements for aid to those Indians who were willing to return home. Those that elected to stay were not to be subjected to further restrictions.

Nov. 11. The Nationality and Flag Act was passed after long and acrimonious discussion. The inclusion of the Union Jack in the South African flag was finally decided 1929, June 12. In the elections the Nationalists renewed their victory of 1924. 1930, May 19. The franchise was extended to all white women.

1931, Aug. The reconstituted Labor Party repudiated its arrangements with the Nationalist Party and the coalition began to break down.

pr. In Southwest Africa the Farmers' and Labor Party was 1932, Apr. organized and began a drive for abolition of the mandate and establishment of the territory as a separate province with responsible government.

Dec. 27. The Union government went off the gold standard, last of the British Dominions to take this step, and then only after prolonged discussion and much disagreement.

1933, Jan. 24. Smuts called upon the government to resign in favor of a national government pledged to empire co-operation on non-racial lines.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A Mar. 30. NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

The two Labor members of the government dropped out, Hertzog remained prime minister, but Smuts and two other members of the South African Party joined the cabinet.

May 17. In the elections the national government won a great victory.

Aug. In Southwest Africa the victory of the National Socialists in Germany provoked an immediate response. The English settlers, by a narrow majority, put through a measure forbidding National Socialist "cells" and the wearing of uniforms. The English and Dutch settlers (a majority, owing to emigration of Germans and immigration from the Union after 1919) became more and more insistent on incorporation in the Union, which the Germans naturally opposed.

1934, June 5. Formal fusion of the South African Party (Smuts) and the Nationalist Party (Hertzog) under the new name of United South African National Party (United Party). The non-fusion element in the Nationalist Party re-formed under the same name and became a group representing republican and anti-native policies (leader D. F. Malan).

June 12. Status of the Union Act, passed to define the position of the Union after the Westminster Statute. It established the Union as "a sovereign independent state" in every respect, though it left the field open for endless discussion regarding the "right of secession" from the British Commonwealth.

Nov. 29. The legislative assembly of Southwest Africa petitioned the Union Parliament for admission to the Union as a fifth province. A commission was sent out which reported (June, 1936) that the existing government was a failure and that there was no obstacle in the mandate to the incorporation of Southwest Africa. But in Dec. the government announced that it had no intention of changing the status of the territory, much less any intention of abandoning the mandate.

1936, Apr. 7. THE REPRESENTATION OF NATIVES ACT finally clarified the native policy of the government. The natives retained the right to register as voters in Cape Province, but they were to be put on a separate electoral roll and were to be permitted to elect three Europeans to represent them in the Union Parliament. A native representative council (22 members, 12 of whom elective) was to be established, but with purely advisory powers.

1937, Apr. 2. The Union government by decree prohibited political activity by foreigners in Southwest Africa (including non-naturalized German residents). Strong protests by the German government were of no avail. In Sept. a new German Party replaced the forbidden German Bund.

- 1937, Nov. A royal commission was appointed to visit Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, in order to investigate the possibility of closer union between them.
- 1938, May 18. The South African elections resulted in a victory for the United Party and Gen. Hertzog remained premier.

9. MADAGASCAR

1916. During the First World War a secret anti-French society was organized among native officials. This was discovered and suppressed with great severity.

1918. Opening of the railway from Tamatave to Tananarivo.

1923. Opening of the railway from Tananarivo to Antsirabe, first section of a line to the south.

1924, May 7. Reorganization of the administrative system, in the direction of decentralization and increase of the number of native officials. The governor-general was henceforth to be assisted by economic and financial councils, composed of an equal number of Europeans and natives, to advise him on public works and general budgetary matters.

1. TURKEY

1918, July 4-1922, Nov. 1. MOHAM-MED VI, sultan.

Oct. 4. Collapse of Turkish armies; flight of Talaat and Enver.

Oct. 30. Armistice of Mudros (p. 948).

Dec. 8. Allied military administration of Constantinople.

1919, Mar. 7. Cabinet of Damad Ferid
Pasha, with a policy of co-operation with the victorious powers.

Apr. 29. Landing of the Italians at Adalia, first step in the taking over of southwestern Anatolia.

May 14. Landing of the Greeks at Smyrna, with approval of the Allies.

May 19. MUSTAPHA KEMAL PASHA
(b. 1880; hero of the battle at the Dardanelles and of the last battles in Syria; ardent Nationalist) arrived at Samsun as inspector of the 3d army. He at once began organization of resistance to the further dismemberment of Turkey and was officially dismissed by the sultan (July 8), and outlawed (July 11).

July 23-Aug. 6. Nationalist Congress at Erzerum, under Mustapha's lead.

Sept. 4. NATIONALIST CONGRESS
AT SIVAS and DECLARATION
OF SIVAS (Sept. 9): affirmed unity of Turkish territory and declared against Allied occupation and the formation of an Armenian state.

Sept. 13. The National Pact: enunciation of six principles, including self-determination, security of Constantinople, opening of the Straits, rights of minorities, abolition of capitulations.

Oct. Victory of the Nationalists in the elections to Parliament.

Oct. 5. Cabinet of Ali Riza, who attempted conciliation with the Nationalists.

1920, Jan. 28. The National Pact was adopted by the Parliament at Constantinople.

Mar. 16. To check the spread of the Nationalist agitation, Gen. Milne and an Allied force occupied Constantinople, while repudiating any idea of depriving the Turks of it. The announced object of the move was to keep open the Straits and to protect the Armenians. The Nationalists were denounced and many sent into exile. A new cabinet under Damad Ferid was set up. Parliament was dissolved (Apr. 11).

Apr. 23. A provisional government was set up by the Nationalists at Angora (Ankara), with Mustapha Kemal as president.

Apr. The Nationalists concluded a military agreement with Soviet Russia, by which they secured necessary supplies.

June 10. THE TREATY OF SEVRES presented to the Turkish government at Constantinople (terms, p. 954).
Vigorous protests of the sultan and uncompromising opposition of the Nationalists, who received more and more popular support.

June 22. Beginning of the Greek advance against the Nationalists.

The Greeks were strongly encouraged by Lloyd George, who meant to use them to force the peace terms on the Turks.

June 24. The Greeks defeated the Turks at Alashehr.

July 9. The Greeks took Brusa.

July 25. Adrianople surrendered to the Greeks.

Aug. 10. THE CONSTANTINOPLE GOVERNMENT SIGNED THE TREATY OF SEVRES. Definitive break between the Nationalists and the sultan's government.

Oct. 21. In a campaign against the Armenian Republic, the Turks took Kars.

Dec. 3. Turco-Armenian peace treaty: Turkey got Kars and Ardahan, and Armenia (now a Soviet republic) was reduced to the province of Erivan.

1921, Jan. 20. The Fundamental Law adopted by the Angora Assembly: provided for sovereignty of the people; a parliament elected by manhood suffrage; responsible ministry; a president with extensive power.

Feb. London Conference of the Allied Powers, with both the Constantinople and the Angora governments represented, as well as the Greeks. Efforts to reach an adjustment broke down.

Mar. 13. Agreement of Mustapha Kemal and the Italians. The latter agreed to evacuate Anatolia in return for promises of extensive economic concessions. The last Italian forces left in Iune.

Mar. 16. TREATY OF MUSTAPHA KEMAL WITH SOVIET RUS-SIA: Turkey was to retrocede Batum; in return Russia recognized the Turkish possession of Kars and Ardahan.

Mar. 23. Beginning of the new Greek offensive. The Greeks took Aftun-Karahissar and Eskishehr (Mar. 28-30), but were thrown back by the Turks (Apr. 2).

July 16-17. Battle of Kutahia. The Greeks took the town, as well as Afiun-Karahissar and Eskishehr.

Aug. 24-Sept. 16. BATTLE OF THE SAKKARIA. Desperate defense of the Turks. The Greeks failed to reach Angora. Though the Allied Powers proclaimed neutrality in the war and attempted to mediate, Lloyd George nevertheless encouraged the Greeks in their aggressive policy.

Oct. 13. Treaty of Kars: Turkey formally recognized the Armenian

Soviet Republic.

Oct. 20. The Franklin-Bouillon Agreement between France and Mustapha Kemal. This followed months of hostility in Cilicia, which France now agreed to evacuate, in return for economic concessions.

1922, Mar. 26. The Allied Powers agreed to some revision of the Sèvres Treaty and attempted a settlement of the Greek-Turkish conflict. The Turks refused to grant an armistice until the Greeks had evacuated Anatolia. Further efforts at mediation (June) again failed.

July 29. The Allied Powers, in an ultimatum to Greece, forbade the occupation of Constantinople.

Aug. 18. Beginning of the Turkish counter-offensive against the Greeks. The Turks took Affun-Karahissar (Aug. 30) and Brusa (Sept. 5). The Greek armies broke and fled in confusion to the coast.

Sept. 9-11. THE TURKS TOOK SMYRNA, which was to a large extent destroyed by fire (Sept. 13-14).

Sept. 15. Lloyd George appealed to the Allied Powers and the British Dominions to join in defense of the Straits against the Turks. The French took a negative stand, as did the Italians. Of the Dominions only Australia and New Zealand showed any great interest.

Sept. 16. A British force under Gen. Harington landed at Chanak. Oct. 3-11. Conference and Convention of Mudania between the Allies and Ismet Pasha, representing the Turkish Nationalists. The Allies agreed to the return of Eastern Thrace and Adrianople to the Turks, and the Turks accepted the neutralization of the Straits under international control.

Nov. 1. Mustapha Kemal proclaimed the ABOLITION OF THE SUL-TANATE. Mohammed VI fled from Constantinople on a British ship.

Nov. 18. Abdul Mejid, cousin of Mohammed VI, proclaimed caliph.

Nov. 20. Lausanne Conference, to conclude peace between the Allies and the Turks. The conference broke up temporarily Feb. 4, 1923, after heated disputes about the abolition of capitulations and the status of Mosul. It resumed sittings Apr. 23 and concluded its work July 24.

1923, July 24. TREATY OF LAUSANNE:

Turkey gave up all claims to the non-Turkish territories lost as a result of the World War, but recovered Eastern Thrace to the Maritza River, with Karagach; Turkey received Imbros and Tenedos, but the rest of the Aegean Islands went to Greece; Italy retained the Dodecanese and England Cyprus; the capitulations were abolished in return for a promise of judicial reforms; Turkey accepted treaties to protect minorities; Turkey paid no reparations, the Straits were demilitarized, with a zone on either bank; they were to be opened to ships of all nations in time of peace and in time of war if Turkey remained neutral; if Turkey was at war, enemy ships, but not neutrals, might be excluded. A separate Turkish-Greek agreement provided for compulsory exchange of populations.

Aug 23. Evacuation of Constantinople by the Allies. The Turks took possession Oct. 6.

Oct. 14. Angora was made the capital of the Turkish national state.

Oct. 29. FORMAL PROCLAMATION OF THE TURKISH REPUBLIC:
Mustapha Kemal president, Ismet
Pasha prime minister.

1924, Mar. 3. ABOLITION OF THE CALIPHATE; all members of the house of Osman banished.

Apr. 20. Adoption of the constitution, an elaboration of the Fundamental Law.

Aug. 6. The Anglo-Turkish dispute about the status of Mosul (left open by the Treaty of Lausanne) was submitted to the League of Nations. 1096 ASIA

Oct. 29. The League Council fixed a provisional line (Brussels line) assigning most of Mosul to Iraq.

1925, Feb.-Apr. Great insurrection in Kurdistan, directed against the religious policy of the government and aiming at autonomy. The suppression of the revolt cost much effort and blood. The leaders were executed. As a result of this rising and various attempts to assassinate Mustapha Kemal, his dictatorial powers were extended.

Aug. Polygamy was abolished and divorce introduced.

Sept. 2. Religious orders suppressed; a severe blow at the conservative opposition to the reforms of Mustapha Kemal.

Nov. Wearing of the fez forbidden.

The use of the veil by women was made optional, but discouraged.

Dec. 16. Mosul award by the League Council; most of the territory, with rich oil-fields, was assigned to Iraq. Strong protests of the Turks.

Dec. 17. ALLIANCE WITH SOVIET RUSSIA, establishing close political and economic collaboration.

1926, Jan.-Feb. Introduction of the new civil, criminal, and commercial law codes, based respectively on Swiss, Italian, and German systems.

June 5. Treaty with England, disposing of the Mosul issue according to the League's decision.

Sept. 1. Civil marriage made compulsory.

1927, Sept. 2. Elections. Mustapha was empowered to name all candidates, so that his party (The People's Party) had a monopoly.

Oct. 15. Historic speech of Mustapha Kemal to the National Assembly, reviewing the whole course of the national revival and movement.

Nov. 1. Mustapha Kemal unanimously elected president for 4 years.

1928, Apr. 9. Abolition of the article of the constitution declaring Islam the state religion.

May 30. Conclusion of a non-aggression pact with Italy for 5 years.

June 13. Agreements with bondholders of the Ottoman public debt as to payments by Turkey.

June 15. Pact with Persia.

Nov. 3. Decree introducing the Latin alphabet, to be in universal use within 15 years. It was applied first to newspapers and then to books. All Turks under 40 years were obliged to attend schools to learn it. Arabic and Persian words were gradually rooted out.

1929, Mar. 6. Treaty with Bulgaria, setling many outstanding questions.

June. Introduction of a high protective tariff, in the effort to encourage Turkish industry. The government steadfastly rejected all foreign investment in Turkey and gradually bought up foreign concessions.

June. Suppression of communist propaganda making clear the limits placed by Mustapha Kemal on friendship with Russia.

Dec. 17. Treaty with Russia, extending and amplifying the Treaty of 1925.

1930, Mar. 28. The name of Constantinople was changed to Istanbul; Angora to Ankara; Smyrna to Izmir; Adrianople to Edirne, etc.

May. Formation of an opposition party (Liberal Republican Party under Ali Fethi Bey) permitted, in the effort to enliven political life. The new party favored a more moderate nationalism and greater co-operation with the west. After an extremely weak showing in the elections, Ali Fethi dissolved it, but an independent group of deputies continued to exist in the assembly.

June-July. Kurd revolt in the region about Mt. Ararat. Tension between Turkey and Persia, whence the insurgents operated.

Oct. 30. TREATY OF ANKARA between Turkey and Greece, following the settlement of property claims of repatriated populations and other outstanding questions. The two parties recognized the territorial status quo and agreed to naval equality in the eastern Mediterranean.

Oct. The Turks attended the first Balkan Conference, at Athens, and took an active part in the work of Greek-Bulgarian reconciliation and the formation of a Balkan pact.

Dec. 23. Dervish rising near Smyrna.

This led to further measures to break the Moslem opposition, 28 leaders being executed.

1931, Mar. 8. Naval agreement with Russia: neither party was to add to its Black Sea fleet, excepting after six months' notice to the other.

May 4. Mustapha Kemal unanimously re-elected president for 4 years.

Oct. 30. Visit of Litvinov to Ankara: renewal of the Turco-Russian Alliance for 5 years.

Oct. 20-26. Meeting of the second.

Balkan Conference at Istanbul.

1932, Jan. 23. Settlement of the Turkish-Persian frontier dispute. May 25. Visit of the Turkish foreign minister, Tewfik Rushdi, to Rome; extension of the agreement with Italy for five years and arrangements for development of trade between the two countries.

July 18. Turkey accepted the invitation to join the League of Nations.

1933, Apr. 22. New arrangement for payment of the Ottoman debt. total was reduced from £T107,-000,000 to £T8,000,000.

Sept. 14. Conclusion of a non-aggression pact for 10 years between Turkey and Greece.

1934, Jan. Five-Year Plan for the development of industry, most of which was to be government-owned. The great depression necessitated a policy of rigid economy, but the encouragement of agriculture, opening of mines, construction of railroads and roads, etc., was continued.

Feb. 9. CONCLUSION OF THE BAL-KAN PACT, between Turkey, Greece, Rumania, and Yugoslavia (Bulgaria having refused to come in): the four powers mutually guaranteed security of their Balkan frontiers and promised to take no action with regard to any Balkan non-signatory without previous discussion.

May. Beginning of an active policy of rearmament, occasioned chiefly by distrust of Italian policy in the eastern Mediterranean.

Dec. 14. Women were given the vote and were permitted to sit in the Assembly (17 women elected in Mar. 1935).

1935, Jan. 1. Introduction of family names. Mustapha Kemal, at the suggestion of the Assembly, adopted the name Kemal Atatürk (father of the Turks).

Kemal Atatürk re-elected president for 4 years.

1936, Apr. 11. The Turkish government appealed to the signatories of the Lausanne Treaty for permission to refortify the Straits (effect of the Ethiopian crisis, p. 963, and Turkish support of the League action).

The international conference July 20. at Montreux approved the Turkish request, Italy not voting. Straits thereby were returned to Turkish control.

The League of Nations 1937, May 29. Council, after acceptance by France and Turkey, adopted a fundamental law for the Sanjak of Alexandretta, which had been drawn up by neutral experts after an appeal by Turkey. 40% of the population of the sanjak is Turkish and a special régime for the district had been provided for in the Franco-Turkish Agreement of Oct. 20, 1921. The situation became acute after the conclusion of the Franco-Syrian Treaty (Sept. 1936) which envisaged Syrian independence. Despite acceptance of the new régime, which called for demilitarization, autonomy, and special rights for the Turkish population, disorders continued in connection with the forthcoming election.

July 9. SIGNATURE OF A NON-AGGRESSION PACT between Turkey, Iraq, Iran (Persia), and Afghanistan, securing the Turks on the Asiatic side as the Balkan Pact did on the European. Turkey generally recognized as a crucial force for peace in eastern Europe and hither Asia.

Oct. 25. Resignation of Ismet Inönü, close collaborator of Kemal Atatürk and since 1925 prime minister. He was succeeded by Jelal Bey Bayar, whose economic training made him especially suited for the management of the extensive industrial and agricultural program of the government.

Dec. 7. Beginning of the Alexandretta crisis. The Turkish government denounced the treaty of friendship with Syria (of May 30, 1926), whereupon the French government sent a military mission to Ankara. After bitter recriminations and threat of war

1938, July 3. The French and Turks came to an agreement: each to send 2500 troops into the sanjak to supervise the elections. The Turks entered the territory July 5. In the elections of Sept. the Turks secured 22 deputies out of a total of 40.

Sept. 2. THE REPUBLIC OF HATAY (i.e. Alexandretta), a new autonomous state, was voted by the new As-The Turks were evidently in sembly. complete control and the republic existed only pro forma.

Nov. 10. DEATH OF KEMAL ATA-TÜRK, founder and president of the Turkish Republic. On the next day the National Assembly unanimously elected

ISMET INÖNÜ, president. 1938-

1939, May 12. Conclusion of a British-Turkish agreement of mutual assistance in case of aggression or war in the "Mediterranean area." Despite close economic relations with Germany, the Turkish government identified itself with the British bloc designed to check German expansion into the Balkans. Negotiations for a similar pact between Turkey and 1098 ASIA

France gave promise of success since the French indicated readiness to abandon Hatay (Alexandretta) completely to the Turks.

June 23. France and Turkey concluded a non-aggression pact, and France agreed to the incorporation of the Republic of Hatay into Turkey. The Turkish Republic thereupon took its stand squarely by the western powers.

2. SYRIA

1918, Oct. 5. A French squadron took Beyrut, which was entered by British troops soon afterward. A Syrian state was proclaimed by Emir Faisal.

1919, July 2. A national congress at Damascus asked for complete independence for Syria, or, failing that, a mandate by the United States or Great Britain.

Sept. 15. The British gave over control to the French.

Oct. 9. Gen. Gouraud, high commissioner.

Dec. Fighting between the Arabs and the French.

1920, Mar. 8. A Syrian national congress again declared for complete independence.

Mar. 11. FAISAL PROCLAIMED
KING. England and France refused to recognize him.

Apr. 25. The supreme council assigned the mandate for Syria to France (approved by the League, July 24, 1022).

July 25. The French took Damascus.

Faisal was dethroned and forced to flee.

Sept. 1. Organization of the territory by the French: states of Aleppo, Damascus, Alaouite, loosely federated (1922) autonomous units, under one French commissioner; Great Lebanon (Christian) given a separate status.

Dec. 23. Anglo-French Agreement on frontiers with Palestine and Iraq. 1921, Mar. 4. A fifth state, Jebel Druse, recognized as autonomous.

Oct. 20. Agreement with Mustapha Kemal and the Turkish Nationalists, ending hostilities (p. 1095).

1923, Mar. 4. The Sanjak of Alexandretta was separated and given autonomy.

Apr. 20. Gen. Weygand, high commissioner.

1925, Jan. 1. Damascus and Aleppo united to form the state of Syria.

Jan. 2. Gen. Sarrail, high commissioner. Feb. 9. Organization of the People's Party, a nationalist group demanding unity of the Syrian states and independence.

Apr. 2. Agreement with Turkey regarding the autonomy of Alexandretta.

July 11. Arrest of Druse notables who had been invited to a conference at Damascus. The Druses accused the French of favoritism toward the Christians.

1925, July 18—1927, June. GREAT IN-SURRECTION OF THE DRUSES, under Sultan Pasha. They soon controlled the countryside and attacked even the larger cities.

Oct. 14. Rising of Damascus, after the exposure of rebels' corpses by the French. The French withdrew from the city.

Oct. 18. Forty-eight-hour bombardment of Damascus, followed by tank and airplane attacks.

Nov. 6. Henri de Jouvenel, high commissioner.

1926, May 7. Second attack of the Druses on Damascus, followed by a second bombardment of the city by the French (May 8-10).

May 23. The Great Lebanon proclaimed a republic by the French.

Oct. 12. Henri Ponsot, high commis-

1927, June. End of the Druse insurrection, after a large-scale campaign. The leaders fled to Transjordania.

1928, June 9. A constituent assembly, summoned by the French, contained a large Nationalist majority. It drafted a constitution which gave no recognition to the French mandate and was therefore rejected by the high commissioner, who prorogued the assembly.

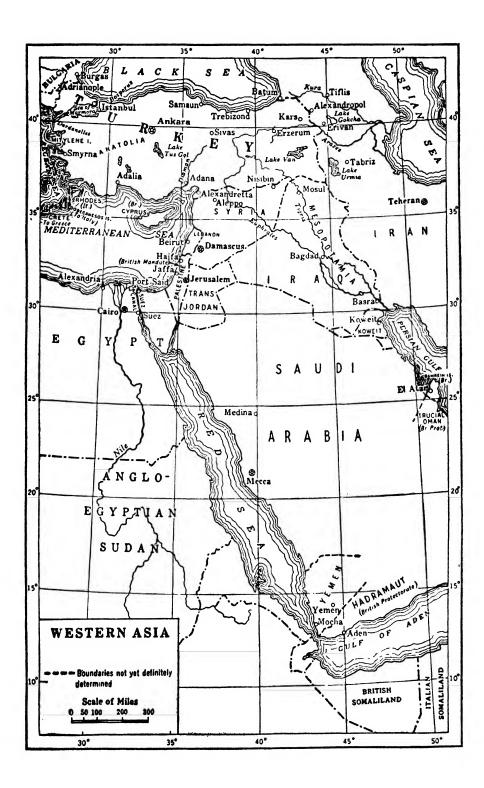

who prorogued the assembly.

1929, Feb. 5. The constituent assembly was indefinitely adjourned.

1930, May 22. The high commissioner introduced a constitution of his own: Syria to be a republic, with a parliament elected for 4 years; this was to elect a president, with a 5-year term. Latakia was also established as a republic.

1932, Jan. Elections; through French pressure the majority turned out to be moderate.

June. The Parliament elected Ahmed Ali Bey el-Abed president, and he was approved by the French.

1933, July. Damien de Martel, high commissioner.

Nov. 16. Treaty with France, following the lines of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty: France to support Syria's admission to the League within 4 years; Syria to remain in alliance with France for 25 years, during which France would enjoy extensive control of foreign relations, army and finance. The treaty was not to apply to the other Syrian states.

1934, Nov. 3. Parliament was indefinitely prorogued because of opposition to the treaty (objection to separate treatment of the Syrian states and to continued French control), and widespread disorders.

1936, Jan. The Nationalist Party (founded 1935) was dissolved, after much Nationalist agitation and disorder. Violent street-fighting in most cities, followed by proclamation of martial law.

Feb. General strike in Syria. The French administration was obliged to permit the formation of a Nationalist cabinet (Feb. 23).

Sept. 9. SIGNATURE OF THE FRENCH-SYRIAN TREATY of friendship and alliance (ratified Dec. 26); mandate to end within 3 years and Syria to be admitted to the League of Nations;

Jebel Druse, Alouite, and Alexandretta to be included in the Syrian state, with special status; the Lebanon to retain its individuality. A treaty between France and the Lebanon was concluded Nov. 13.

Oct. 6. Outbreak of rioting in Alexandretta by way of protest of the Turkish population against the new arrangements. The problem, aggravated by Turkey's interference, was finally disposed of through League action and a separate Franco-Turkish agreement (p. 1097).

Nov. 30. The elections resulted in a huge Nationalist victory, whereupon (Dec. 21) a new president and premier took office.

1937, Jan. 4. The Lebanon Constitution, suspended some years previously, was restored.

July-Aug. Insurrection of the Kurds in northeastern Syria, who advanced claims to autonomy and separate status. The movement was put down by liberal use of the air forces.

Sept. 8. The Pan-Arab Congress at Bludan to deal with the Arab problem in Palestine. Syria became a center of Palestine insurgent activity during the Arab revolt of 1930-.

3. PALESTINE AND TRANSJORDANIA

1916, Apr. 26. Secret Anglo-French-Russian Agreement providing that Palestine should be placed under international administration.

1917, Nov. 2. BALFOUR DECLARATION, stating that the British government favored "the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of that object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine."

Dec. 9. The British armies took Jerusalem (p. 948).

1920, Apr. 25. The supreme council assigned the mandate for Palestine and Transjordania to Great Britain (approved by the League of Nations, July 24, 1922), on the terms set forth in the Balfour Declaration, excepting that provisions for a Jewish national home were not to apply to Transjordania.

July 1. Civil government instituted: Sir Herbert Samuel, high commissioner. 1921, Feb. An Arab congress demanded the establishment of a legislative assembly.

May 1-6. Serious anti-Jewish riots by the Arabs, who objected to the sudden influx of Jewish immigrants and to the acquisition of lands by Jewish interests.

Sept. 1. A constitution was promulgated by the high commissioner: there was to be an appointive executive council and a partly elective legislative council.
The Arabs refused to vote for the council and therefore the constitution could not be put into effect. The territory was ruled by executive decree.

1923, May 26. Transjordania was organized as an autonomous state, ruled (since Apr. 1, 1921) by Emir Abdullah ibn Hussein, son of the Sherif of Mecca.

1925, Apr. 1. The Hebrew University at Jerusalem was opened by Lord Balfour.

July 1. Field Marshal Plumer, high commissioner.

- 1928, Feb. 20. Transjordania was recognized as independent, the British retaining military and some financial control.
 - July 6. Sir John Chancellor, high commissioner.
- 1929, Aug. FIRST LARGE-SCALE ATTACKS UPON THE JEWS, of whom many were killed. The conflict followed a dispute concerning Jewish use of the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem.
- 1930, Mar. 31. Report of an investigating commission under Sir Walter Shaw. It attributed the conflict to Arab hatred of the Jews and disappointment of the Arab hopes for independence.
 - May 17. A decree restricting Jewish immigration led to a Jewish strike of protest.
- Aug. 25. Report of the League of Nations mandates commission on the clashes in Palestine, containing harsh condemnation of the British administration for having supplied inadequate police protection.
- Oct. 20. THE PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER, following the report of Sir John Hope-Simpson. It stressed the plight of the growing Arab landless proletariat and the increasing land-hunger, and suggested that Jews be forbidden to acquire more land while Arabs were landless, and that Jewish immigration be stopped so long as Arabs were unemployed.
- Nov. Acrimonious debate in the British Parliament on the Passfield Paper. The British government denied that any change of policy was envisaged. Nevertheless the confidence of the Jews was badly shaken.
- 1931, July 14. Sir Arthur Wauchope, high commissioner.
- 1932. Restrictions on Jewish immigration were somewhat relaxed, but this move simply led to more and more outspoken protests from the Arabs.
- 1933, Feb. 25. The high commissioner rejected an Arab demand that sale of Arab lands be forbidden and immigration restricted. Thereupon the Arab executive announced a policy of non-co-operation with the British and boycott of British goods.
 - Dec. Jewish protests and riots against restriction of immigration (this problem having become crucial in view of the persecution of Jews in Germany).
- 1935, Jan. 4. Opening of the great British oil pipeline from Mosul to Haifa.

- 1936, Apr. Formation of the Arab High Committee with the aim of uniting all Arabs in opposition to the Jewish claims. By this time the demonstrations and riots of the Arabs had reached the dimensions of open war against the Iews. Conciliatory efforts made by the four Arab rulers (Aug.) were of no effect. The Arabs called a general strike which continued until Oct. To meet the situation the British government, somewhat belatedly, sent additional troops and appointed a commission of investigation and recommendation (Peel Commission), which took evidence in Palestine during the autumn. The Arabs boycotted it until just before its departure in Jan. 1937.
- 1937, July 8. Publication of the Peel Commission report. Convinced that Arabs and Jews could not get along together, the commission recommended a scheme for partitioning the mandate, making three states: (1) A Jewish state (about one-third of the whole) embracing the coastal territory from the northern boundary to just south of Jaffa. This state would contain about 300.000 Jews and about 290.000 Arabs; most of the land would be held by Arabs. (2) A British mandated territory comprising a strip from Jaffa along the railway to Jerusalem, both cities, as well as Bethlehem, to be included in it. (3) The rest was to be an Arab state, united with Transjordania.
- Aug. 2. The Peel scheme was adopted by the World Zionist Congress, conditional on revisions in favor of the Jews. A minority voted against it and Jewish non-Zionist opinion throughout the world denounced the plan as a violation of the Balfour Declaration.
 - Aug. 23. The mandates commission of the League of Nations, and later the assembly, accepted the plan in principle.
- Sept. 8. THE PAN-ARAB CONGRESS AT BLUDAN (Syria), composed of some 400 non-official representatives from all the Arab countries. The congress was called to deal with the Palestine situation and voted overwhelmingly against the Peel plan. Demands of the Arabs were: termination of the mandate and establishment of Palestine as an independent state in alliance with Great Britain; abandonment of the Jewish national home and cessation of Jewish immigration; the Jews to have merely the status of a guaranteed minority within the Arab state; partition unreservedly rejected. The congress arranged for a permanent executive, for economic support of the Palestine Arabs, and for extensive propaganda. Boycott of Jewish goods and enterprises, and eventually of the British, was provided for.

Sept. 26. Assassination of Yelland Andrews, British district commissioner for Galilee, brought on the most acute phase of the great Arab insurrection.

The British administration arrested the members of the Arab High Committee and deported many of them to the Seychelles. The most influential Arab leader, the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin el Husseini, took refuge in a mosque and later (Oct. 16) fled to Syria, which became the headquarters of the insurgents. The more radical elements (terrorist) secured ever greater control of the movement, and in Palestine outrages against the Jews multiplied to the point of pitched battles (Jerusalem, Nov. 14).

Nov. 11. The British commissioner set up special military courts to deal with terrorists: the mere carrying of firearms or bombs made an offense punishable by death.

1938, Jan. 4. The British government announced the postponement of the partition scheme and the appointment of a new commission under Sir John Woodhead to study the boundaries of the new states and to investigate economic and financial aspects. The commission took evidence in Palestine from Apr. until Aug., but was systematically boycotted by the Arabs.

Mar. 3. Sir Harold MacMichael arrived to replace Sir Arthur Wauchope as high commissioner. . This was taken to presage more drastic repression of dis-Before the end of the year the British had from 25,000 to 30,000 troops in Palestine.

June 29. Execution of Solomon ben Yosef, a young Jewish terrorist, representing the revisionist wing of Jewry which advocated retaliation on the Arabs. During July and Aug. Palestine was immersed in an undeclared war, with great bombings in the Jerusalem, Haifa, and Jaffa Arab markets, with considerable loss of life. By many it was claimed that these outrages were not the work of Jewish extremists, but of Arab terrorists who dominated the whole Arab population.

Oct. 2. Massacre of 20 Jews at Tiberias. The Arab extremists seized several towns, which were retaken by the British only with some difficulty (Bethlehem retaken, Oct. 10; the old city of Jerusalem, Oct. 18).

Nov. 9. Report of the Woodhead Commission. After analyzing various schemes of partition, the commission concluded that they were all impracticable. Thereupon the British government abandoned the plan and decided to convoke a conference of Jews and Arabs, the latter not only from Palestine but from the other Arab countries, all of which had demonstrated complete solidarity with the Palestinians.

1939, Feb.-Mar. The Palestine Conference in session at London. Neither Jews nor Palestine Arabs were ready to accept a British proposal, despite efforts of non-Palestine Arabs to effect a compromise. The conference closed (Mar. 17) without reaching a settlement. Thereupon, May 17. The British Plan was published.

It provided for an independent Palestine state in 10 years, in treaty relationship with Great Britain. Arabs and Jews were to share in the government "in such a way as to ensure that the essential interests of each community are safeguarded." During a transition period Arabs and Jews were to serve as heads of departments (but with British advisers), and to take part in an advisory executive council according to population. After 5 years a representative body was to draft a constitution, which must provide for the different communities and for a Jewish home. In the matter of Jewish immigration the principle of absorptive capacity of the country was given up. Immigration was to stop after 5 years unless the Arabs agreed to its continuance. In that period 75,000 might be admitted, giving the Jews 1/3 of the population in 1944. The government was henceforth to prohibit or regulate transfer of land.

The British parliament approved this plan by a majority of only 89 as against the usual 200 or more (May 23), but it was violently denounced by the Jews throughout the world as making a "territorial ghetto" of the homeland. The Palestine Arabs also rejected it. Clashes and outrages again broke out in many parts of the mandate. The situation continued very unsatisfactory but was soon overshadowed by the crisis in Europe (p. 966). When England declared war on Germany (Sept. 3), the Zionist organizations at once proclaimed solidarity with Britain against persecuting Germany.

The (Wahabi) Dynasty of Ibn Saud

4. SAUDI ARA'BIA AND YEMEN

1915. July-Dec. Correspondence of Sherif Hussein of the Hejaz and the British regarding the terms of Arab intervention in the war against Turkey (p. 937).

1916, June 27. Hussein proclaimed the establishment of the Arab state.

Oct. 29. HUSSEIN PROCLAIMED KING OF THE ARABS.

Nov. 6. England, France, and Russia recognized Hussein as head of the Arab peoples and King of the Hejaz.

1919, May. Hejaz forces defeated by Abd al-Aziz ibn Saud, leader of the Wahabis of Nejd, a puritanical sect of Moslems (rose about 1740 and extended rapidly over interior Arabia; the Wahabis took Mecca and Medina, 1803–1806, and threatened Damascus. 1808; they were defeated and suppressed by Mohammed Ali of Egypt, 1812–1820). Ibn Saud, by 1913, had conquered much of eastern Arabia and had also made a treaty of friendship with Great Britain (Dec. 26, 1915). His claims were in direct competition with those of Hussein.

1920, Aug. Ibn Saud conquered and annexed Asir.

1921, Nov. 2. Ibn Saud took Hail and put an end to the Rashid dynasty.

1922, July. Ibn Saud took Jauf and ended the Shalan dynasty.

Dec. 2. Agreement between Ibn Saud and Iraq defining the frontier.

1924, Aug. 24. The Wahabis of Ibn Saud attacked Taif, in the Hejaz, and took it (Sept. 5).

Oct. 3. HUSSEIN WAS FORCED TO ABDICATE by his subjects, in favor of his son Ali. Ali was obliged to evacuate Mecca.

Oct. 13. Ibn Saud took Mecca.

1925, Jan.-June. Siege of Jidda by the Wahabis.

Nov. 1. Agreement of Ibn Saud with Iraq regarding the frontier tribes.

Nov. 2. Agreement of Ibn Saud with Great Britain, regarding the frontiers of Transjordania.

Dec. 5. Medina surrendered to Ibn Saud.

Dec. 19. The Sherif Ali abdicated.

Dec. 23. Ibn Saud took Jidda.

1926, Jan. 8. IBN SAUD PROCLAIMED KING OF THE HEJAZ and Sultan of Nejd (changed Feb. 1927 to King of the Hejaz and Nejd).

1926, Sept. 2. Treaty of friendship between Italy and the Imam of Yemen; beginning of Italian efforts to establish influence on the east coast of the Red Sea.

1927, May 20. Treaty between Ibn Saud and Great Britain, which recognized the complete independence of the kingdom.

1929, Aug. 3. Treaty of friendship with Turkey.

Aug. 24. Treaty of friendship with Persia (Iran).

1930, Feb. 24. Treaty of friendship with Iraq.

1932, May-July. Invasion of rebels from Transjordania and subsequent insurrection in Nejd, evidently due to opposition to the westernizing and centralizing policy of the king (road-building, telegraph construction, aviation, etc.).

Sept. 22. The kingdom of Hejaz and Nejd was renamed Saudi Arabia.

1933, July 27. Treaty of friendship with Transjordania, ending years of hostility and tension between the two states.

1934, Feb. 11. Treaty of Sanaa concluded for 40 years with Great Britain.

Mar.-June. Campaign against the Yemen, after numerous border troubles and continued rivalry. Ibn Saud was completely successful, but the final peace (June 23), mediated by Great Britain, left Yemen independent, Ibd Saud acquiring only a rectification of the frontier.

1936, Apr. 2. Conclusion of a treaty of non-aggression and Arab brother-hood between Arabia and Iraq. This became the basis of a whole series of pacts between the Arab states, all of which were united in their stand on the Palestine question. General prevalence of the Pan-Arab idea and talk of an Arab federation. Yemen adhered to the treaty in Apr.

May 7. Agreement between Arabia and Egypt, the latter recognizing the annexation of the Hejaz by Arabia.

1937, Oct. 15. Renewal of the 1926 treaty between Italy and the Yemen, for a period of 25 years. The Imam of Yemen, occupying a crucial position on the Red Sea, has tried hard to maintain an independent status between Arabia, Britain, and Italy.

5. IRAQ

1919, Jan. 10. The British occupied Baghdad.

1920, Apr. 25. The supreme council assigned the mandate for Iraq to Great Britain, which accepted (May 5).

July-Dec. Great Arab insurrection against the British. Several British garrisons were besieged for weeks before the movement could be suppressed. It was simply the first indication of the determination of the Arabs to be independent.

Oct. 1. Sir Percy Cox named high commissioner.

1921, June 23. Emir Faisal, former King of Syria, arrived at Basra.

Aug. 23. Cox proclaimed FAISAL KING OF IRAQ, after a plebiscite had turned out 96% in favor.

1921-1933. FAISAL, king.

1922, Mar. 25. A military agreement was concluded with Great Britain, giving the latter a large measure of control.

June 18. Insurrection of the Kurds under Sheikh Mahmud. The movement aimed at independence or autonomy, and was not suppressed until July, 1024.

Oct. 10. An agreement with England transformed the mandate into an alliance relationship. Ratified by the Iraqi assembly June 11, 1924.

Dec. 2. Treaty with Nejd regarding the frontiers. Nevertheless the following years were marked by constant border raids and clashes between tribes, some of which were divided by the agreement.

1923, Apr. 30. Protocol to the treaty of Oct. 10: Iraq was to become free when she joined the League of Nations and in no case later than four years after the conclusion of peace with Turkey.

July 24. Treaty of Lausanne. The decision regarding the Mosul area, rich in oil, was left to negotiation and led to a long-drawn dispute (p. 1095).

Sept. 25. Sir Henry Dobbs, high commissioner.

1924, Mar. 27. The Constituent Assembly met and ratified the agreement with Great Britain.

July 10. The Assembly adopted the Organic Law (constitution), introducing a liberal, parliamentary system of government.

July 19. End of the Kurd revolt.

1925, Nov. 1. Agreement with Nejd regarding the assignment and rights of the border tribes.

1926, Jan. 13. In accordance with the League recommendation that the relationship with England should be extended if Mosul was to be assigned to Iraq, a new treaty was signed extending the connection to 25 years, or until Iraq joined the League.

June 5. Settlement of the Mosul question, by agreement between England and Turkey. Most of the area went to Iraq.

1927, Nov. Visit of King Faisal to London, in an attempt to secure Iraq's admission to the League immediately.

Dec. 14. New treaty with Great Britain, which recognized the independence of Iraq and promised to support Iraq's admission to the League in 1932. In return Iraq granted Britain three new air bases and agreed that British officers should train the army.

1929, Mar. 2. Sir Gilbert Clayton, high commissioner.

Aug. 11. Treaty of friendship with Iran.
Oct. 3. Sir Francis Humphreys became high commissioner on the death of Clayton (Sept. 11, 1929).

1930, Feb. 24. Treaty of friendship with Nejd.

Sept. 11. New Kurd outbreak under Sheikh Mahmud. The sheikh surrendered in Apr. 1931.

Nov. 16. The Iraqi Parliament ratified the treaty with England, providing for admission to the League in 1932. The treaty confirmed Iraq's complete independence and sovereignty.

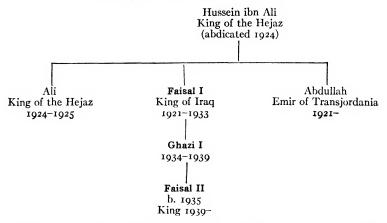

1931, Jan. 22. The Anglo-Iraqi Treaty was presented to the League.

1932, Apr.-June. Third rising of the Kurds. The rebels were driven over the Turkish frontier by Iraqi forces aided by the British air patrol.

Oct. 3. IRAQ WAS ADMITTED TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

after a favorable though somewhat dubious report of the mandates commission. Iraq was required to give guaranties for the protection of minorities, the rights of foreigners, freedom of conscience, recognition of debts, etc.

The Hashimite Dynasty of Iraq

Nov. The frontier with Syria, long in dispute, was finally settled through the aid of the League of Nations.

1933, Aug. Massacre of the Christian Assyrians as they tried to recross the frontier from Syria, to which they had migrated earlier. The League took up the matter and tried to arrange for resettlement elsewhere, but with no success.

Sept. 8. Death of King Faisal at Berne.
1933-1939. KING GHAZI, son of Faisal.
1934, July 14. Opening of the great oil pipeline from Mosul to Tripoli in Syria. The line to Haifa was opened Jan. 14, 1935.

1935, Mar. Formation of a national government under Gen. Yasin Pasha el Hashimi. Incipient revolts were put down with vigor, and compulsory military training was introduced (June 19). The new government won a decisive victory in the elections of Aug. 6.

1936, Apr. 12. Conclusion of a treaty of non-aggression and Arab brother-liness with Saudi Arabia. This agreement became the basis for a general Arab alliance, the aim of the Pan-Arab movement. Other Arab states were invited to join.

Oct. 29. Coup d'état of Gen. Bakr

Sidqi, a prominent Pan-Arab leader. The king was a party to the movement, which was followed by the dissolution of Parliament and a practical dictatorship of Gen. Sidqi.

Nov. 26. Formation of a new party, the Society for National Reform, an organ of the governing group. Vigorous prosecution of road and railroad construction, irrigation, and other schemes of development.

1937, July 9. Conclusion of the Turkish-Iraqi-Iran-Afghan non-aggression pact, forming a loose Oriental entente of Moslem states able to offer effective resistance against imperialist designs of outside powers.

Aug. 11. Assassination of Gen. Sidqi by a Kurd. Formation of a new Pan-Arab cabinet. The Iraqi government took an active part in defense of the claims of the Palestine Arabs and became one of the prime movers in the cause of Arab solidarity.

1939, Apr. 4. Death of Ghazi in an automobile accident at Baghdad. In the ensuing disorders the British consul, supposed to have plotted the accident, was stoned to death. Ghazi was succeeded by his 3-year-old son, 1939- FAISAL II, as king.

6. IRAN

The First World War may be said to have sealed the fate of the old régime in Iran (Persia until 1935). The government 1914, Nov. 1. Proclaimed neutrality, but was far too weak to enforce it.

The only troops available were the Cossack Brigade, under Russian officers, and the gendarmerie (since 1911) under Swedish officers who tended to sympathize with the Germans. Russian forces were still in occupation of important towns in the north, while the British established themselves on the Gulf coast.

1915, Jan. 7. The Turks, campaigning against the Russians in the Caucasus, took Tabriz, which, however, was soon retaken by the Russians (Jan. 30). Persian territory was freely violated by both sides. At the same time the British, to strengthen their Russian allies, granted them a free hand in their zone under the 1907 Agreement, while the neutral zone was added to the British sphere.

Jan. Arrival in Persia of Herr Wassmuss, former German consul at Bushire. Wassmuss organized a number of tribes around Bushire and harassed the British, who were in occupation of the town. At the same time other German agents (Niedermayer, Zugmayer) established themselves in other towns of the interior, with the purpose of opening a route to Afghanistan and preparing a Turkish-German advance on India. One mission reached Afghanistan, but the amir evaded any commitment. For a time, however, the German influence was predominant.

Nov. The Russians invaded northern Persia in order to break the German influence at Tehran.

1916. The Turks, having defeated the British in Mesopotamia, twice invaded Persia, but were stopped by the Russians.

Mar. Sir Percy Sykes arrived at Bunder Abbas and began the organization of the South Persia Rifles, with which it was hoped that southern Persia could be protected from German influence and Turkish invasion. He marched to Kerman (May), Yezd (Aug.), Ispahan (where the Russians were already in occupation), and Shiraz (Nov.). His force ultimately numbered some 11,000 men, with which the British position was reinforced as against the Persian gendarmerie and the fractious tribesmen.

1917. Mar. The Turks, defeated at Baghdad, fell back from Persia.

Nov. The Russians, following the Bolshevik Revolution, also began to withdraw from the country. By this time the country was in a state of complete anarchy.

and a small British force, the object of which was to stiffen the Georgians and Armenians against the Turks and to establish a Caucasus front against possible German advance from the Ukraine. Dunsterville reached Enzeli from Baghdad, but, under threat from the Bolsheviks at Baku, was obliged to fall back on Hamadan. His force was gradually increased, and another, under Gen. Sir. Wilfrid Malleson, was sent to northeastern Persia to block a possible Bolshevik attempt on India from that direction.

Nov. A British flotilla, organized on the Caspian, drove the Turks out of Baku.

1919, May 21. Comm. D. T. Norris of the British flotilla, defeated the Bolshevik naval force at Alexandrovsk. In Aug. the British ships were handed over to the White Russians.

1919. The Persian government sent a delegation to the Paris Peace Conference and demanded abrogation of the 1907 Agreement, abolition of the capitulations and consular guards, restoration of Transcaspia, Merv, and Khiva, the Caucasus and Derbent, including Erivan and Baku, Kurdistan, and everything to the Euphrates River. This delegation, at the instigation of the British, was not officially recognized.

Aug. 9. THE ANGLO-PERSIAN AGREEMENT, negotiated by Sir

Percy Cox. Once again Britain reaffirmed the independence and integrity of Persia. Britain further engaged to furnish advisers and officers and to supply munitions for a force to preserve order. A loan was to be granted to Persia and aid to be given in railroad and road construction. The tariff was to be revised. This agreement was intended to seal the British ascendancy, and for that reason it brought forth at once widespread opposition in Persia. The Assembly (Maj/is) refused to convene to ratify 1920, Jan. 10. Persia became one of the original members of the League of Nations.

May 18. The Bolshevik fleet, having defeated the counter-revolutionary forces, took Enzeli and Resht, and occupied most of Gilan (Soviet Republic of Gilan, to Oct. 1921). The British forces in northern Persia fell back on Kazvin.

Aug. 24. The Persian Cossack Brigade, commanded by Col. Storroselski, took Resht from the Bolsheviks, but was later defeated and driven back from Enzeli, after which the British helped to reorganize 1921, Jan. 18. The British began to withdraw from northern Persia.

THE COUP D'ETAT OF REZA Feb. 21. KHAN. The latter was born in Mazandaran in 1878 and was an officer of the Cossack Brigade. Highly intelligent, energetic and patriotic, he engineered the dismissal of the Russian officers after the defeat at Enzeli and then entered into negotiations with Sayyid Zia ud-Din, an eminent writer and reformer. With 3000 Cossacks Reza marched on Tehran and established a new government in which Zia ud-Din was prime minister and Reza himself minister of war and commander in chief.

Feb. 26. The first act of the new government was to drop the unratified British agreement and conclude a treaty with the Bolsheviks. The latter, in order to break down the British ascendancy, agreed to evacuate Persia, abrogate the capitulations, cancel all debts and concessions, and turn over, without indemnity, all Russian property in Persia.

Persian-Turkish treaty of Dec. 12. peace and friendship.

1922-1927. Financial mission of Dr. A. C. Millspaugh, an American expert. He was given wide powers and enjoyed the firm support of Reza Khan, though the finances of the army were kept beyond his control. With a new and enlarged army Reza suppressed a serious revolt in Gilan and (1922) subjected Azerbaijan.

1923, Oct. 28. Reza Khan took over the premiership. The shah, unable to approve the dictatorship, left for Europe, from which he never returned (died 1930).

1924, Mar. Rumors of the shah's return provoked a widespread agitation for a republic. Supposedly inspired by the Bolsheviks and by the events in Turkey, the movement was opposed by the religious leaders, who persuaded Reza of their view. Reza's threat of resignation brought the popular excitement to an end.

Campaign against Sheikh Khazal of Mohammerah and the Bakhtiari chiefs of southwestern Persia who, with the support of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company and the British government, had made themselves practically independent. They were all subdued and government control established throughout most of Persia.

1925, Feb. The Mailis invested Reza Khan with dictatorial powers.

Oct. 31. The Majlis declared the absent shah deposed.

Dec. 13. Reza Khan proclaimed shah by the Assembly. He was crowned Apr. 25, 1926, with the title 1925-1941. REZA SHAH PAHLAVI. new shah consistently followed a policy like that of Mustapha Kemal in Turkey, excepting for the anti-religious aspect. He continued the work of restoring order, built up the army, developed roads, began the construction of a railway from the Caspian to the Persian Gulf, encouraged aviation, etc.

1926, Apr. 22. Persian-Turkish-Afghan Treaty of mutual security, concluded under Russian auspices. Nevertheless, friction between Persia, Turkey, and Iraq over the Kurdish populations in the boundary regions, continued to cause much unpleasantness.

The Junkers Company (Ger-1927, Feb. man) opened regular air service to Baku, Tehran, Ispahan, and Bushire. This continued until 1932.

The Persian government advanced its claims to the Bahrein Islands, the Arab sheikh of which was under British protection. Discovery of oil gave the islands a new value. conflicting claims have not yet been settled.

1928. Persia made an agreement with Imperial Airways (British), permitting regular flights along the Gulf coast to Karachi and India.

The Persian government, having introduced a new judicial system based on the French (1927), declared the capitulations abolished. New minimum tariff rates were offered to nations concluding treaties. Britain, followed by other powers, accepted the new system.

The National Bank of Persia was founded.

1929, Aug. 11. Persia recognized the Iraqi State and thus paved the way for better relations.

1930, Mar. 28. Introduction of the gold standard.

June-July. A great rising of the Kurds on the Persian-Turkish frontier strained relations between the two countries, but led to renewed efforts to establish a satisfactory frontier.

1931, Jan. Foreigners were forbidden to own agricultural land in Persia.

The government took over the Persian lines of the Indo-European Telegraph Company. At the same time the government established close control over all foreign trade, though private enterprise was permitted as before.

1932, Jan. 23. The Persian-Turkish boundary was revised in the vicinity of Mt. Ararat, thus obviating a constant source of trouble with Turkey.

King Feisal of Iraq visited Apr. 26. Tehran, paving the way for friendly relations.

Oct. Founding of the Persian fleet on the Gulf. The nucleus was a number of gunboats built in Italy for the Persian government.

Nov. 26. The Persian government cancelled the concession granted to d'Arcy in 1901 and taken over by the Anglo-Persian Oil Company in 1909. Long negotiations to revise the concession had broken down. The British government, financially interested in the company since Aug. 14, 1914, and the largest single shareholder, brought the matter before the council of the League of Nations, which urged further efforts at direct negotiation. The result was the new concession of May 29, 1933, which extended the original contract from 1961 to 1993, but restricted the area from 500,000 square miles to 250,000 and after 1938 to 100,000. The company was to pay £225,000 annually in taxes for 15 years and £300,000 annually for a second period of 15 years. The minimum royalty was to be £750,000 annually.

1933, Apr. Swedish and Danish firms were awarded contracts to complete the Trans-Persian Railway.

1934, May. A concession granted to the Standard Oil Company of California to exploit for oil in the Bahrein Islands raised once again the Persian claim to ownership.

June 16-July 2. Visit of Reza Shah to Ankara and Constantinople. Persia and Turkey drew ever closer.

1935, Mar. 21. PERSIA BECAME OF-FICIALLY IRAN.

1937. July 9. Conclusion of a NON-AGGRESSION PACT between AFGHANISTAN, TURKEY, IRAQ, AND IRAN. These four nations now formed an Oriental Entente comparable to the Balkan Entente.

1939, Jan. Opening of the Trans-Iranian Railway from the Caspian to the Persian Gulf. This important line, begun in 1927, was constructed entirely with Iranian capital.

AFGHANISTAN

Afghanistan remained neutral throughout the First World War, despite German and Turkish missions and despite widespread religious agitation for participation on the Turkish side. Heavy subsidies from the government of India no doubt played a considerable rôle in holding the amir to the policy of his father.

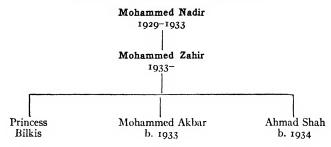

1919, Feb. 19. Assassination of Habibullah near Jelalbad, evidently because of his subservience to the British. brother Nasrullah was proclaimed amir by the conservative, religious parties, but his son Amanullah, governor of Kabul, not only held the capital, but enjoyed the support of the army. Nasrullah therefore vielded.

1919-1929. AMANULLAH, amir. Borne upon a wave of anti-British sentiment he took advantage of the war-weariness in India to proclaim a religious war and appeal to the Indian Moslems to rise against British rule. The Afghans began to invade India, but after a few initial successes were thrown back and threatened with invasion themselves. Neither side being prepared for a long struggle, they negotiated.

Aug. 8. The Treaty of Rawalpindi (supplemented by further agreements of Nov. 22, 1921), by which Britain recognized for the first time the complete independence of Afghanistan and the right to direct relations to other powers. The British subsidies were discontinued.

Rulers of Afghanistan since 1929

1921, Feb. 28. Conclusion of a treaty of friendship with Soviet Russia, similar to the Turkish-Russian treaty. There followed a period of several years during which Amanullah leaned rather heavily on the Bolsheviks as a protection against the British.

Mar. 1. Treaty of friendship and alliance with Turkey, laying the basis for a close relationship between the two powers.

June 22. Treaty with Persia (nonaggression), another link in the Oriental combination under the aegis of Russia.

1923, Apr. 9. PROMULGATION OF THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW, or constitution, modeled on the Turkish and representing Amanullah's desire to modernize his country. The amir retained extensive powers, but the new assembly (council of state), which was one-half appointed and one-half elected, had certain powers over legislation. The constitution was followed by a landslide of reform edicts, aiming at the establishment of an effective central administration, development of education, encouragement of trade and industry, opening of the country through roads, etc. Amanullah played the rôle of a Peter the Great, hastily overturning everything in his desire to modernize the country.

1926, June 10. Amanullah assumed the title of king.

Aug. 31. A neutrality and non-aggression pact was signed with Russia, supplementing the earlier agreement.

1927, Nov. 27. Conclusion of a second treaty of friendship and security with Persia.

1928, Jan.-July. Amanullah and his queen paid an extended visit to India, Egypt, and Europe, arranging for further contacts and for financial and advisory support.

May 25. Second treaty with Turkey.

Nov. Outbreak of a great revolt directed against the king and his revolutionary reforms. Opposition broke out on many sides, but drew its inspiration largely from the religious leaders and tribal chiefs.

1929, Jan. 14. Amanullah, unable to maintain himself, abdicated in favor of his older brother, Inayatullah, an easygoing and ineffectual person.

Jan. 17. Bacha-i-Saquao, a bandit leader with a small but determined following, captured Kabul and had himself proclaimed 1929. HABIBULLAH GHAZI. His position was challenged by many other claimants, among others by Amanullah, who collected an army at Kandahar, but was defeated in his advance on Kabul.

Mar. Arrival from Europe of Gen. Mohammed Nadir Khan, the most outstanding Afghan officer. He managed to collect an army and

Oct. 8. Took Kabul. Thereupon he was proclaimed (Oct. 16)

1929-1933. MOHAMMED NADIR
SHAH. Habibullah Ghazi, having been captured, was executed, but the new ruler was faced by a large number of pretenders and followers of Amanullah, who were only gradually subdued. The general policy of Nadir was to continue the work of modernization, but in a less ostentatious and offensive way.

1932, Feb. A new constitution (Fundamental Rules) was issued. Its general tenor was much like that of the 1923 Constitution, but it provided for a two-chamber assembly, an appointed chamber of notables, and an elected council of state.

1933, Nov. 8. Assassination of Nadir Shah by a servant of one of his victims. The murder had no political significance, and the shah was succeeded without trouble by his son

1933MOHAMMED ZAHIR SHAH, who, with the aid of his uncles, continued the wisely moderate but progressive policy of his father.

1936. The government granted to the Inland Exploration Company of New York a 75-year concession for the exploitation of oil.

1937, July 9. Afghanistan joined with Turkey, Iraq, and Iran in forming an Oriental Entente, apparently designed as a bulwark against pressure from any of the great European powers.

1938, June 20-24. Revolt of Shami Pir, a religious leader who operated from Waziristan. His movement was directed against the dynasty and its policy. After his defeat, Shami Pir fled to India, where he was arrested and transported to Syria.

8. INDIA

During the first two years of the First World War, the situation in India was comparatively quiet and the country co-operated loyally in the war. Mahatma Gandhi, saintly leader of the Indians in South Africa (p. 858), returned to India and threw his entire influence on the side of the government. India supplied about 1,200,000 troops (combatants and laborers), who took part in the campaigns in Europe, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Egypt, and East Africa. But during the second half of the war unrest became more and more prevalent. Rising prices and heavy taxation served as a stimulus to renewed agitation.

1916-1921. BARON CHELMSFORD,

Viceroy. He was met at once with a demand for reform by the Indian members of the council, a demand which was vigorously supported (Dec. 29) by the Indian National Congress (chiefly Hindu) and the All-India Moslem League, which established common action by the Lucknow Pact, determining the electoral proportions of each group. The demand of these bodies was for an elected legislative assembly. At the same time revival of radical nationalism under B. G. Tilak and Annie Besant. To anticipate serious trouble, the British government, through the secretary for India, Mr. Montagu, 1917, Aug. 20. Announced a policy of developing self-governing institutions in India, with a view to introduction of responsible government. Mr. Montagu visited India in 1918 and together with Lord Chelmsford worked out a report (1918, Apr. 22) for limited self-government, which was presented to Parliament in July and which was at once denounced by the Indian National Congress as wholly inadequate.

1918-1919. Severe crop failures with acute distress and starvation, together with an influenza epidemic which caused 5,000,000 deaths, aggravated the situation still further and led to serious outbreaks.

1919, Mar. 21. THE ROWLATT ACTS, two anti-sedition measures which enabled the government to intern agitators without trial and entitled judges to try cases without juries, brought the discontent to a head, Hindus, Moslems, and Sikhs uniting in opposition to the government. Gandhi now proclaimed a campaign of passive resistance and non-co-operation. Stoppage of work, demonstrations and riots. The Punjab was in open rebellion, which culminated in

Apr. 13. THE AMRITSAR MASSACRE. Gen. Dyer, aiming to impress the populace with the strength of the government, ordered his troops to fire on an unarmed assembly; 379 persons were killed and 1200 wounded. Intense indignation throughout India. (An army council decided that Dyer's action was "an error of judgment," but a committee of the House of Commons condemned it.)

May 10-Aug. 8. The Afghan War, provoked by the Amir Amanullah in the hope that the Moslems would support his plans for conquering India. The amir entirely underestimated the strength of the British position and he was easily defeated. THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT introduced the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and established the system known as "dyarchy." The Indian legislature was to consist of the viceroy, council of state (60 members, of whom 26 were to be officials), and legislative assembly (140 members, of whom 100 were to be elected). The Indian Parliament was opened at Delhi in Feb. 1921. The provincial governments were to have Indian as well as British ministers. Important matters were "reserved" for the governor and his executive council; the less important (sanitation, education, agriculture, etc.) were to be "transferred" to the Indian ministers. Provincial legislative councils were to be 70% elective, with a franchise rigidly limited by property qualifications.

The Indian National Congress rejected the new system out of hand, but the more moderate elements withdrew from the Congress and founded the National Liberal Federation, whose members co-operated with the government and in many places worked the new system with considerable success.

by Gandhi, launched the first non-co-operation campaign (satyagraha) and boycott of British goods (hartal). Gandhi preached the wearing of homespun cloth and the revival of village industries (spinning-wheel). The whole movement aimed at "home rule" (swaraj) and supported the Moslem Khilafat movement, which was a protest against the treatment of the Turks by the victorious allies.

1921-1926. LORD READING, viceroy.
1921. Height of the revolutionary movement. Despite Gandhi's insistence on non-violent action, terrorist outbreaks were frequent, and in some parts of the country serious peasant risings against landlords and moneylenders took place: rising of the Akalis (Sikh peasant puritans) in the Punjab, Mar. 1921; rising of the Moplahs (Moslem peasants of Malabar) and widespread slayings of Hindu landlords. The latter episode resulted in a rift between the Moslem League (led by Mohammed and Shaukat Ali) and the Indian Nationalists, which in turn resulted in chronic clashes between Hindus and Moslems, with much bloodshed.

Nov. 2. The Ali brothers were convicted and sentenced to two years in prison for calling on the Moslem troops to desert.

Dec. 24. The Indian National Congress gave Gandhi sole executive authority. Gandhi denounced all violence and introduced a campaign of civil disobedience toward the law. Despite his great authority, violence continued to spread, culminating in 1922, Feb. 4. The Chauri Chaura affair.

Insurgent peasants, led by Indian Nationalists, attacked the police station at Chauri Chaura (United Provinces) and killed 22 policemen. Gandhi at once ordered suspension of non-co-operation and civil disobedience, but the government took drastic measures.

Mar. 10. Gandhi was arrested and sentenced to six years' imprisonment.

Therewith the first passive resistance campaign began to collapse.

1923, Sept. 25. Victory of the moderate element in the Indian National Congress. This group (the Swaraj Party), led by C. R. Das, favored participation in the elections with the aim of using its representatives in the legislature to obstruct government and so force the granting of home rule. In the elections the Nationalists did, in fact, win an impressive victory, but many of the elected deputies soon forgot about obstruction and began co-operation with the government. The leaders, Das and Motilal Nehru, began to advocate the grant of dominion status for India, leaving independence aside.

1924, Feb. 4. Gandhi was released from prison because of his precarious health. By this time the situation had quieted down considerably, and Sept. 26. A United Conference at Delhi brought together representatives of the Hindus, Moslems, Parsees, Sikhs, and Christians, who agreed to set up local committees to prevent religious clashes.

1925, Sept. 7. The Nationalists in the Indian legislative assembly called for the establishment of round-table conferences to frame a scheme for responsible government.

1926-1931. BARON IRWIN, viceroy.

1926, Nov. 8. The British Parliament appointed the Statutory (Simon)
Commission, with members from all British parties, to study the situation in India and the working of the Montagu-Chelmsford system. The Indians (both Hindu and Moslem) voted to boycott the commission because no Indians were included in it. The total effect of the move was to revive agitation and call forth further disorder.

1928. India was swept by a great series of strikes among the Bombay textile workers, railway employees, etc. These strikes marked the emergence of the industrial proletariat as an important factor. The movement had a pronouncedly revolutionary flavor.

Aug. 28. An All-Parties Conference at Lucknow voted for a scheme of Dominion status, worked out by a constitutional committee of the Indian National Congress (the Nehru Report). This decision aroused much dissatisfaction among the more radical elements and led to the

Aug. 30. Foundation of the Independence of India League by Jawaharlal Nehru (son of Motilal Nehru, author of the Dominion scheme). Similar independence organizations were founded by other groups.

Dec. 22. At the All Parties Conference in Calcutta Gandhi again assumed leadership and persuaded the conference to grant the government one year in which to introduce Dominion status, failing which another campaign of non-co-operation should be inaugurated.

1929, Apr. 12. The Trade Disputes Act and the Public Safety Act demonstrated the government's determination to deal firmly with radical labor leaders, communists, and terrorists, many of whom were arrested and imprisoned. Nevertheless, the situation in India became rapidly as bad as, if not worse than, in 1920–1921. The world depression made itself acutely felt and increased the misery of the lower classes.

Oct. 31. The government announced that round-table conferences would be opened with the objective of Dominion status. The viceroy thereupon opened discussions with Gandhi and other leaders (Dec.).

1930, Jan. 1. At the Indian National Congress at Lahore the extremists overruled the moderates, voted for complete independence, and decided to boycott the round-table conferences. Under Gandhi's guidance

Mar. 12. The second civil disobedience campaign was initiated. Amidst widespread rioting and innumerable arrests, Gandhi marched to the sea at Cambay and began to make salt illegally as a protest. The government replied by drastic censorship of the press and wholesale imprisonment of leaders.

May 5. Gandhi was again arrested. Height of the disorders: attacks on government salt works, risings of peasants and factory workers, terrorist attacks on officials, etc.

June 13, 24. Publication of the two volumes of the Simon Commission's Report, recommending administrative modifications, but denying full responsible government. Needless to say, these suggestions were condemned out of hand by the Indian Nationalists. The British government therefore left the report on one side and convoked

Nov. 12—1931, Jan. 19. The first Round-Table Conference, attended by representatives of the Indian princes and by Indian Liberals who were prepared to co-operate with the government. The conference decided in favor of the principle of federation and at least a measure of responsible government.

1931, Jan. 26. Gandhi was released from prison and, at Lord Irwin's request, entered upon discussions with the government. These resulted in

Mar. 4. The Delhi Pact (Irwin-Gandhi Pact); Gandhi agreed to discontinue civil disobedience and promised that the Congress would recognize the Round-Table Conferences; in return the government agreed to release political prisoners who had not been guilty of violence. End of the second passive resistance campaign.

Sept.-Dec. Second Round-Table Conference. Gandhi went to London to attend it, but the conference broke up without reaching agreement on the problem of representation of religious and other minorities.

1931-1936. THE EARL OF WILLING-DON, viceroy.

1932, Jan. 4. Gandhi and other Nationalist leaders were again arrested, and the Indian National Congress was declared illegal. These moves by the government had but little effect. In prison Gandhi embarked upon his "fasts unto death" in behalf of the untouchables, for whom he demanded the vote in the forthcoming constitutional revision. Outside his prison the struggle of the Nationalists and the masses was resumed. In the meanwhile 1933, Apr.—1934, Nov. 22. A parliamentary joint committee, reviewing the material of the Simon Commission and of the Round-Table Conferences, worked out a draft constitution.

1933, July 15. An All-India Congress at Poona, under Gandhi's lead, decided on resumption of civil disobedience Aug. 1.

Aug. 1. Gandhi was once more arrested and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, but he had to be released after a few days, in view of his health after a hunger strike.

1934, Oct. 24. Gandhi withdrew from the National Congress, without, however, renouncing all political activity.

1935, Apr. 1. The Reserve Bank of India, a central bank controlling the currency, was established to insure financial stability.

Aug. 2. THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT passed by the British Parliament. It embodied the results of the investigations and of the Round-Table Conferences, and completely transformed the governmental system of India. Burma and Aden were separated from India and became crown colonies. British India was divided into 11 provinces, each under an appointed governor and an appointed executive council. Each province was to have an elected legislature (bicameral in 6 provinces and unicameral in 5), representation to be based on a communal arrangement. The provincial governments were to enjoy wide autonomy, though the governors retained certain emergency powers. The ultimate objective was the establishment of an All-India Federation, to include the native states as well as the provinces of British India. Pending the adhesion of a number of provinces, this arrangement was postponed. But the 11 provinces together are under the governor-general and his executive council. A central legislature at Delhi consists of an upper house (council of state) composed of 34 elected members and 26 appointed members, and a lower house (legislative assembly) of 105 members elected by the provincial assemblies and 40 appointed members. The governor-general retained control of defense, foreign affairs, Christian Church affairs, The act was to go into effect Apr. 1, MARQUESS OF LINLITH-GOW, viceroy and governorgeneral.

1937, Jan.-Feb. Elections for the provincial assemblies. The All-India Congress (chiefly Hindu and demanding complete independence) was the only well-organized party and so won absolute majorities in 6 provinces (and pluralities in 3 others). The objective of the party having been to force the abrogation of the new constitution and secure the convocation of an Indian constituent assembly, the leaders were now confronted with the problem whether or not to make use of such power as had been gained in the elections.

Mar. 18. In party congress at Delhi the moderate wing of the party (favoring co-operation with the government) won out over the extremists (led by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, who called for a thorough-going socialist as well as nationalist policy). But the moderates demanded assurances from the provincial governors that they would not use their emergency powers to frustrate the program of the party. The government having refused to bind itself to what amounted to a violation of the new constitution, the All-India Party abstained from forming administrations when

Apr. 1. The Government of India Act went into effect. In order to break the deadlock, the British government (Apr. 26) gave assurance that the provincial governors would not use their power "for detailed interference." This enabled the moderate wing to compromise and decide for co-operation. All-India governments were set up in 7 provinces. Once in power they liberated many political prisoners and restored the civil liberties. Attention began to turn more and more toward extensive social (especially agrarian) reform. The war in China and the revelation of Japanese imperial designs also contributed to greater cordiality and collaboration between the Nationalists and the British authorities.

1938. Further development of the split between moderates and radicals in the Congress Party. At the party congress at Haripura the left wing won out, and Subhas Chandra Bose, disciple of Nehru, was elected president over Gandhi's candidate. Gandhi declared the election fraudulent and threatened to leave the party.

1939, Mar. 2. Gandhi embarked upon another fast to force the ruler of the little native state of Rajkot to introduce reforms. The viceroy succeeded in effecting a compromise, but the episode apparently did much to revive the Mahatma's prestige.

Mar. 10-12. The party congress at Tripuri rejected a radical proposal to send the British government an ultimatum demanding independence, and

Apr. 29. Bose resigned as president of the Congress because of differences with Gandhi and the moderates. Rajendra Prasad, an adherent of the Mahatma, was elected to succeed. Gandhi began to advocate a policy of conciliation toward the native princes, but June 12. Fifty native states rejected the British proposal for federation, while leaving the door open for other arrangements.

9. INDO-CHINA

a. SIAM

1917, July 22. Siam declared war on Germany and Austria-Hungary, and in the summer of 1918 sent a small expeditionary force to Europe. The war enabled the government to inaugurate the work of freeing the country of extra-territoriality and tariff restriction. By the peace treaties Germany, Austria, and Hungary were obliged to abandon their claims in these 1920, Jan. 10. Siam became an original member of the League of Nations.

Sept. 1. A TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES did away with American extra-territorial rights and granted Siam tariff autonomy.

1924, Mar. 10. By treaty with Japan the latter power also gave up extraterritorial and tariff rights.

1925, Feb. 14. TREATY WITH FRANCE.
France followed the example of the United States and Japan, gave up all special rights, arranged for arbitration of disputes, and finally agreed (Aug. 25, 1926) to the establishment of a demilitarized zone along the Indo-Chinese frontier. England concluded a similar treaty July 14, and the other European powers followed suit, so that by 1926 Siam had secured full jurisdiction and tariff autonomy.

1925-1935. RAMA VII (Prajadhipok), king, succeeding his brother. He appointed a council of state, composed of five royal princes, to aid him in government, and at once initiated a policy of economy, reduction in the number of officials, etc.

1927, Mar. 25. With the ratification of the last treaties with the powers, the consular courts came to an end and the Siamese government established a new tariff.

1931, Mar.-Oct. The king visited the United States in order to have his eyes operated on.

1932, June 24. A COUP D'ÉTAT PUT AN END TO ABSOLUTE GOVERN-

MENT in Siam and established constitutional government. The movement was organized by a group of young radicals, educated in Europe or imbued with European democratic theory, who formed a People's Party. The king, held captive for a short time, at once agreed to a constitution and the organization of a senate. The definitive constitution was adopted Dec. 10: provision for popular sovereignty; the council of state, though appointed by the king, to be responsible to a national assembly, half the members of which were to be appointed while the other half was to be elected by universal (male and female suffrage).

1933, Apr. 3. The king, convinced that the country would support him against the radicals, suspended the new constitution and set up a new council of state. This led to a new

June 20. Coup d'état, led by Col. Phya Bahol Sena and other army officers. While affirming their loyalty to the king, they forced the resignation of his council of state and recalled the National Assembly. Phya Bahol Sena became prime minister.

Oct. 11. Attempted counter-revolution by a number of princes and nobles, led by Prince Bovaradet. The movement failed miserably; several of the leaders were captured and most of the others fled the country.

1934, Jan. 12. The king left for a prolonged visit to Europe, from which he did not return.

1935, Mar. 2. Abdication of King Prajadhipok, who was dissatisfied with the new régime and found himself in conflict with the government over the execution of the counter-revolutionary leaders.

1935-1946 ANANDA MAHIDOL, the tenyear-old nephew of Prajadhipok, became king, and a council of regency, headed by Prince Aditya Dibabha, was set up in his behalf. The young ruler was being educated in Europe and did not even visit his kingdom until Nov. 1938. In the meanwhile the country was governed by a triumvirate consisting of the prime minister (Phya Bahol Sena), the minister of defense (Col. Luang Bipul Songgram) and the foreign minister (Luang Pradit), one of the chief figures of the popular movement and a man of decidedly advanced tendencies. The government has, in recent years, paid much attention to defense and the development of aviation, and has, thus far, succeeded in maintaining a position of neutrality as between England and France and, more recently, between China and Japan.

b. OTHER STATES

The situation after the First World War in Indo-China and Malaysia was a comparatively quiet one, marked by rapid expansion of administrative control, development of sanitation and education, and above all by increase of population and The extension of rubber productivity. plantation in particular had a profound effect on the economic setup in many of the Some progress was made toward the introduction of a popular element in government, and in all parts of the region (least in the Malay States) there was a growing demand for national recognition. The great depression after 1030 struck all states equally hard, led to the adoption of economic control measures by the governments, and called forth a considerable amount of labor agitation, with some communistic tinges. The great Far-Eastern crisis after 1931 revealed the exposed position of the whole area, and in all states measures were taken to strengthen defenses. The completion of the harbor works, drydock, air-field, and fortifications of Singapore (June, 1937) made that crucial port what was considered to be one of the strongest places in the world.

rrench indo-china. In 1922 a number of elected members were added to the colonial council which assisted the governor-general, and in 1927 a government council (60 members, of whom 35 are Frenchmen) was established and given advisory powers. The year 1930–1931 was marked by rather serious outbreaks in Tonkin, which were put down with considerable rigor. But agitation against French rule revived and, if anything, is constantly growing.

NETHERLANDS EAST INDIES. A legislative council (Volksraad) was created in 1916 and met in 1918. It was composed of 24 nominated and 24 elected members, the latter chosen by local councils. Racially there were 30 Dutchmen, 25 East Indians, and 5 members of other races (Chinese, e.g.). This body was given advisory powers in budgetary, military, and other matters. In 1922 the Volksraud became a genuinely legislative body when its assent was made obligatory for all government ordinances. In 1925 the entire administrative system was overhauled, and in 1929 it was decreed that in future the Volksraad should have 30 East Indian members (out of the 60). Despite the vigorous and efficient rule of the Dutch, there developed a movement for independence, represented by the National Indonesian Party. In 1937 the Volksraad unanimously petitioned Dutch government to grant Dominion status within 10 years.

10. CHINA

1914, Aug. 23. The Japanese declaration of war against Germany was followed by violation of China's neutrality (Sept. 2) and capture of Tsingtao (Nov. 7).

DEMANDS in secrecy. An ultimatum extracted (May 8) modified acceptance of the first four groups: (1) Japanese succession to German rights in Shantung; (2) extension to 90 years of the leases in southern Manchuria with commercial freedom for Japanese there; (3) a half interest in the Han-yeh-p'ing Company which operated iron and steel mills at Han-yang, iron mines at Ta-yeh, and a colliery at P'ingshan; and (4) a declaration that no part of China's coast should be leased or ceded to any power. The fifth group, calling notably for Japanese advisers in political, financial, and military affairs, and railway concessions in the Long River Valley (Britain's sphere of interest), was set aside.

Dec. 9. Yüan Shih-k'ai, following a monarchist campaign by the Ch'ou An Hui (Aug. 14), and election and invitation by a hand-picked national convention, accepted imperial office for the ensuing Jan. 1, and adopted the reign title Hung Hsien; but in face of immediate successful rebellion in Yünnan led by Ts'ai Ao (Dec. 25), 1916, Mar. 22. Yüan cancelled his imperial plans and organized a republican cabinet under Tuan Ch'i-jui, senior general of the Pei Yang clique. Yüan died June 6 and was succeeded by Li Yüan-hung, who promptly restored the Constitution of 1912 and convoked the original Parliament of 1913.

1917, Jan. 23. Special rights were exacted by Japan in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia.

May 23. Dismissal of Tuan led to a rising of northern military governors. Chang Hsün, called to intervene, declared in Peking, with help of K'ang Yu-wei, July 1. The restoration of the Manchu dynasty, which was again over-thrown (July 12) by Tuan, who resumed the premiership. Resignation of Li left the presidency to the vice-president, Feng Kuo-chang (elected Oct. 1916). Sun Wen headed a secession government at Canton (Sept.).

Aug. 14. WAR WAS DECLARED AGAINST GERMANY AND

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, and labor battalions were sent to France, Mesopotamia, and Africa. China secured termination of German and Austrian extra-territoriality and Boxer indemnity payments, and return of their concessions at Tientsin and Hankow. The Allies postponed their Boxer payments five years.

against any Communist Russian threat provided for action by Japanese-trained Chinese troops in Siberia under Japanese direction (notes Mar. 25, treaty May 16, clarified Sept. 6). Loans of perhaps 250,000,000 yen for Manchurian projects were contracted, about half through Premier Terauchi's agent, Nishihara, with Premier Tuan and his clique, now called the An-Fu (Anhui-Fukien) Club.

Aug. 12. A newly selected Parliament convened, and elected Hsü Shihch'ang president (Sept. 4-June 1922). Chinese politics continued, however, to be dominated by personal ambitions and the schism between the governments of Peking and Canton.

1919. Refusal of the Versailles Peace Conference to return the former German concessions in Shantung to China aroused violent resentment, refusal to sign the treaty (June 28), and (rather ineffective) boycott of Japanese goods.

Nov. 16. The Hutuktu of Urga placed Mongolia again under Chinese suzerainty, in recognition of a new Chinese garrison, but expulsion of the garrison by Mongols, led by White Russian Baron Ungern von Sternberg (Jan. 1921), and his expulsion by forces of the Far-Eastern Republic, resulted in formation of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Government (July 6), under Soviet auspices.

nilitary dictators left no real power to the national government, which struggled to maintain its envoys abroad. Revenues from customs and salt were already pledged and administered for service of foreign loans. Those from railways and land taxes were absorbed by local armies for which the civilian population felt no concern since they supported no local interests. Since the death of Yüan Shih-k'ai there was no personality, no concrete cause strong enough to direct or to claim the loyalty of all Chinese.

1922, Feb. 4. THE WASHINGTON CON-FERENCE resulted in a Nine-Power Treaty to respect China's sovereignty, independence, territorial and administrative integrity, to maintain the "open door," and to afford China opportunity to develop stable government; a Nine-Power Treaty (Feb. 6) to grant immediate customs revenue increase to an effective 5%, and to call a conference to prepare for Chinese tariff autonomy; and a Sino-Japanese Treaty (Feb. 4), which was strictly observed, to evacuate Japanese troops from Shantung, and to restore to China all former German interests in Tsingtao and the railway to Tsinan, in return for their assessed value plus Japanese improvements. The mines were to be operated by a joint company. Britain announced (Feb. 1) return of Wei-hai-wei (actually effected Oct. 1, 1930). Joint resolution by 8 powers (Dec. 10, 1921) called for re-examination of Chinese law and its administration in relation to extraterritoriality.

1924, Jan. 21. The first Kuo Min Tang national congress at Canton (Sun Yat-sen president) admitted Communists to the party, and accepted Russian advisers, notably Michael Borodin (arr. Sept. 1923) who reorganized the party for offense. Chiang K'ai-shek (Chieh-shih, b. 1887), himself trained in Japan, headed Russian and German instructors in a new Whampoa Military Academy (June). Sun Wen presented his platform in a series of lectures on the San Min Chu I, "Three Principles of the People" (Nationalism, Democracy, and Social Progress), which he had already defined in 1907. Upon death of Dr. Sun (March 12, 1925) he and his doctrine were promptly canonized as a focus for Chinese loyalty.

May 31. Soviet Russia, in fulfillment of repudiation (July 1919 and Sept. 27, 1920) of the tsar's ill-gotten gains, gave up extra-territoriality, concessions at Tientsin and Hankow, and the rest of the Boxer indemnity, to be used for education under Russian veto. The Chinese Eastern Railway was placed under joint management.

Despite Japanese objection to competition with the South Manchurian Railway, based on minutes of a Peking conference Dec. 4, 1905, the Chinese built two lines, Ta-hu-shan to Tung-liao and Kirin to Hailung.

Remission by the United States of the $6,000,000 Boxer indemnity balance (May 21) created the Sept. 17. China Foundation for Promotion of Education and Culture which has since made annual grants for scientific education, and has housed and built up the National Library beyond any Chinese precedent.

1925. Sentiment against the "unequal treaties" and against the British, who used gunfire to disperse dangerous student demonstrations at Shanghai (May 30) and Canton (June 23), found effective expression in a strike and boycott of British goods and shipping, until Oct.

1926, July-Oct. Chiang K'ai-shek's northern campaign, with aid of Russian Gen. Blücher (then called Galens), followed the T'ai P'ing route from Canton through Hunan to Hankow (Sept. 6) and Wuch'ang (Oct. 10).

1927, Feb. 19-20. From the British, tired of boycott, and hopeful of wooing the Chinese from the Russians, the Nationalists extracted rendition of concessions at Hankow and Kiukiang.

Mar. 24. Seizure of Nanking gave the Communists a chance to foment trouble for Chiang by attacking foreigners (6 killed). An international force of 40,000 men protected Shanghai.

Apr. 18. Chiang and the conservative members of the Kuo Min Tang split with the radicals at Hankow and set up a new government at Nanking. Surface harmony was restored by a purge of Russians and Communists from Hankow in return for (temporary) retirement of Chiang from public life (Aug. 8). Advance to Peking was partly blocked by Japanese troops, sent to protect residents of Tsinan. Chiang married (Dec. 1) Soong (or Sung) Meiling, a sister of Sun Wen's widow, of T. V. Soong, minister of finance, and of the wife of H. H. K'ung, minister of industry, commerce, and labor.

1927-1934. A considerable body of the landless were organized on the Communist model of Soviet Russia in Kiangsi and adjacent Fukien, where they seized the land. Under Mao Tse-tung and Chu Te they defended themselves against all attacks from Nanking. When dislodged they effected an orderly long trek (1934–1935) through Kueichou and Szechüan into northern Shensi.

1928, Apr. 7. Chiang was recalled to lead a fresh northern campaign, in cooperation with Yen Hsi-shan, model governor of Shansi since 1912, Feng Yü-hsiang, a magnetic but erratic northern war lord since 1020, and two Kuangsi strategists, Li Tsung-jen and Pai Ch'ung-hsi. Despite conflict (May 3-11) with Japanese troops, again in Tsinan (withdrawn May 1929), Peking was occupied (June 8), renamed Peip'ing, and the capital transferred to Nanking. Chihli Province was renamed Hopei. The Chinese indicated their resentment at Japanese intrusion by a vigorous boycott (1928-1929). Chang Tso-lin, military governor in Manchuria since 1011 with Japanese approval, was forced to return there; and, since he now rejected Japanese advice, was assassinated (June 4). His son Chang Hsüeh-liang completed unification by recognizing the Nanking government (Nov.).

Sun Wen had indicated that, after military unification, a period of political tute-lage must precede constitutional democracy.

Accordingly

Oct. 10. The central executive committee of the Kuo Min Tang promulgated a temporary organic law which provided for a council of state headed by the president (who is also the highest military authority), presiding over five administrative divisions: executive, legislative, judicial, civil service, and censorial. All appointments to these offices were to emanate from the central executive committee and the party congress.

A scries of treaties with 12 states (July 25-Dec. 22) recognized the Nanking government and its right to complete tariff autonomy provided it practiced no national discrimination.

1929-1930. Japanese concern over the certainty of rapid loss of a large market for her cotton goods if the Chinese textile industry should receive protection dragged out treaty negotiations until May 6, 1930. Tariff autonomy, a substantial revenue source, was regained May 16. By 1930, 9 nationalities had lost extra-territorial privilege in China, and several more had by treaty agreed to its end when it should be universally abolished; but it was still (1939) retained by France, Great Britain Japan, and the United States.

1930. A contract was given to a Dutch engineering company for a modern harbor at Hulutao near the head of the Gulf of Chihli, to serve as outlet for the railway system under Chinese ownership which would shortly enter competition with the South Manchurian Railway.

Oct. 1. Wei-hai-wei restored to China by Great Britain.

1931, May 5. A People's National Convention in Nanking adopted a provisional constitution which confirmed separation of five branches within the government, transferred power of executive appointment to the state council chairman, established autonomy of the (hsien) districts under provincial authority, and guaranteed personal freedom. The government pledged itself to free education and social insurance. A national congress to inaugurate full constitutional government should be called when autonomous district organization should be complete in a majority of provinces.

July 1. Serious anti-Chinese riots in Korea, stimulated by false report of a minor affair at Wanpaoshan in Manchuria, resulted in renewal of the boycott against Japanese goods. Report (Aug. 17) of murder by Chinese soldiers of a Japanese officer (Nakamura) in West Manchuria (June) inflamed Japanese opinion.

1931-1932. THE JAPANESE OCCUPATION OF MANCHURIA. The Kuantung army, engaged in night maneuvers at Mukden (Sept. 18), alleged an explosion on the railway as excuse for the preconcerted seizure before morning of the arsenal and of Ant'ung, Yingk'ou, and Ch'ang-ch'un, leaving to the Chinese troops no option save withdrawal. Amid foreignoffice statements of intention to localize the incident, Kirin was seized (Sept. 21) and the whole of the Three Eastern Provinces was steadily occupied (Harbin, Feb. 5, Floods in the Long River Valley beyond recent precedent, added to Communist pressure, prevented any military effort to save Manchuria; but an immediate and more intense Chinese boycott cut Japanese exports (Nov.-Dec.) to one-sixth their usual figure. Subsequent vigorous flood-control measures averted new calamity and won popular esteem for the government.

1932, Jan. 7. United States Secretary of State Stimson notified all signatories of the Nine-Power Treaty of Feb. 4, 1922 that the United States would recognize no gains achieved through armed force contrary to the Pact of Paris of Aug. 27, 1928.

Jan. 28-Mar. 4. To compel the Chinese to abandon their economic war, 70,000 Japanese troops landed at Shanghai and drove the Chinese 19th Route Army from the vicinity of the International Settlement, destroying Chapei. An agreement (May 5) established a demilitarized zone about the settlement and termination of the boycott.

Feb. 18. INDEPENDENCE OF MANCHUKUO (Manchuria), to consist of the former Three Eastern Provinces with Jehol, was proclaimed at Hsin-ching (New Capital) the former Ch'ang-ch'un. Henry P'u-i, who abdicated the throne of China (1912), was installed as regent (Mar. 9), and promoted (Mar. 1, 1934) as Emperor of the K'ang Te reign. Japanese advisers and secretaries controlled from the first all important activities.

Sept. 15. A protocol established a close protectorate of Japan over Manchukuo.

Oct. 2. Report of a League of Nations commission of inquiry under the Earl of Lytton (signed Sept. 4) found that Japanese action Sept. 18-19, 1931, was not self-defense, and that creation of Manchukuo did not flow from a "genuine and spontaneous independence movement." It recommended establishment in Manchuria of an autonomous administration under Chinese sovereignty with international advisers and police, and recognition of Japanese economic interests.

1933, Feb. 24. Approving this report, the League Assembly adopted the Stimson formula of non-recognition, and indicated that Japanese military pressure should cease.

Jan.-Mar. Japanese occupation of Jehol and advance south of the Wall (Apr.) forced May 31. The T'ang-ku Truce, which required Chinese troops to evacuate the Tientsin area.

1934, Nov. China abandoned the silver standard for a managed paper currency compelled by an American policy of purchasing silver (June).

1935, Mar. 23. Russia sold to Manchukuo her interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway after negotiations begun in May 1933.

Apr. The government decreed one year of military training for all male high-school and college students to provide 100,000 reservists each year.

June 9. The Japanese army extracted the Ho-Umezu Agreement for withdrawal from Hopei of troops objectionable to the Japanese.

Continuing excessive cost of occupation of Manchukuo, in which bandits and irregular guerrillas prevented any durable pacification, led the Japanese army to attempt to force or buy, without actual invasion, formation of a local Chinese government willing to afford Japan opportunity for exploitation of resources and markets of North China. Efforts to secure secession of five provinces (Shantung, Hopei, Shansi, Chahar, and Suiyüan) having failed,

Nov. 24. An East Hopei autonomous régime was set up between T'ungchou (outside Peking) and the sea. Japanese goods were openly smuggled wholesale into China through this area, and narcotics were poured from it upon the world market.

Dec. 18. A Hopei-Chahar political council was established at Peking under Gen. Sung Che-ytian, who rendered lip service to the Japanese but made no vital concessions.

1936, July 19. Chiang succeeded in gaining positive control of Kwangtung, in spite of Japanese aid to his adversaries, and of Kwangsi (Sept. 6), where the local leaders loudly demanded war against Japan, for which Chiang was still unprepared. The same demand was constantly voiced by the Chinese Communists, who had set up (Oct. 1935) orderly government in northern Shensi.

Sept. Japan presented seven secret demands (known Oct. 1) under threat of immediate invasion of both North and Central China. Most serious were: brigading of Japanese with Chinese troops against Communists everywhere (ground for action in any part of China), employment of Japanese advisers in all branches of government, autonomy for five northern provinces, and reduction of tariff to the level of 1928. Although Japan sent troops to Shanghai, Nanking stood sirm.

Dec. 12-25. Gen. Chang Hsüeh-liang kidnaped Chiang K'ai-shek at Si-an to force him to declare war on Japan. Demonstration of loyalty to Chiang throughout China, even by the Reds whom he had pursued since 1929 and who now effected his release, testified to moral unity.

1937, Jan. 28. Negotiations terminated the long anti-Communist campaign, and brought the Shensi government into harmony with Nanking.

The Hankow-Canton Railway was completed with help from British Boxer indemnity funds, and a new Hangchow-Nanch'ang Railway was opened.

June 1. Szechüan was brought into the new national union, made effective by telegraph, long-distance telephone, and radio communication; Sino-American and Sino-German airlines; 75,000 miles of new motor roads; and a uniform stabilized paper currency. Achievement of political unity and stability (1927-1937) supplemented and accelerated fundamental changes which had been in progress since 1912 in many departments of life, often led by students returned from study abroad. Vital to China's clearly approaching struggle with Japan was introduction of modern finance and banking. Finance Minister T. V. Soong in 1932 announced a balanced budget, conversion of domestic debt, and abolition of likin transit dues which had been a vexation ever since the T'ai P'ing Rebellion. Substitution (Nov. 1934) of paper silver certificates for the new standard silver dollars (minted March 1, 1933) operated to concentrate in the treasury large deposits of silver bullion. These the United States treasury under the Pitman Act agreed (July 9, 1937) to exchange for gold, thus affording a large volume of credits abroad just when they were urgently required for purchase of arms.

Scholarship was immensely stimulated by close contact with western thought and literature. An official commission (1914–1928) drafted from the archives a History of the Ch'ing Dynasty to complete the standard series. Wang Kuo-wei (1877–1927) was a traditional scholar brilliant in decipherment of Shang oracular inscriptions as in textual and historical criticism. His elder friend Lo Chen-yii is noted for his archeological publications. Younger men have carried modern methodology into every domain of the humanities and sciences. Hu Shih (b. 1891) has led (since 1917) in developing a completely successful pai hua "plain speech" style of writing closely allied to colloquial speech and far easier to use and read than the terse classical style. It has won general acceptance for scholarly, literary, and practical pur-Introduction of punctuation has facilitated understanding of both ancient and modern texts, and preparation of indexes makes their content accessible to a greater degree than ever before. A flood of periodicals, quarterly, monthly, and weekly (220 included in a current union index, 1934), afford a medium for scholarly publication and interchange of current views almost totally lacking in 1912. Education has been altered as much in content and method as in diffusion. Elementary pupils increased (1912-1935) from 2,793,633 to 11,667,888, and high-school students from 52,100 to c. 500,000. In place of 4 colleges in 1912 there were (in 1933) 40 universities, 40 colleges, and 29 technical schools, with 43,000 students, libraries totaling 4,500,000 volumes, and a budget of over $40,000,000 silver.

1937- THE JAPANESE CAM-PAIGNS IN CHINA (no declaration of war, for technical reasons of international law). The conflict had been long in the offing, and the evidence would seem to indicate that Japan decided to act before the renaissance of China had gone too far.

July 7. The incident at Lukouchiao (near Peking): Japanese troops, on night maneuvers, clashed with Chinese. The fighting spread rapidly and led to the seizure of Peking (July 28) and Tientsin (July 29) by the Japanese. A large-scale campaign war begun in northern China. Without meeting much resistance, the Japanese took Kalgan (Sept. 3), Paoting (Sept. 24), Shihchiachuang (Oct. 10), Kueisui (Oct. 14), and T'ai-yüan (Nov. 9). By this time the Chinese had become better organized and were succeeding in slowing down the advance, though inferiority in equipment told heavily upon the Chinese throughout.

Aug. 8-Nov. 8. THE SHANGHAI
CAMPAIGN. The killing of two Japanese marines at a Chinese military airdrome near Shanghai led to the landing of a Japanese naval force (Aug. 11) which soon found itself endangered by vastly superior Chinese forces. The Japanese were obliged to send an army which, after dogged resistance by the Chinese and very severe fighting, ultimately forced the Chinese back from the city (Nov. 8). The fall of Shanghai was followed immediately by the taking of Soochow (Nov. 20) and by an energetic drive up the Yangtze River. Merciless bombing of Chinese cities by the Japanese outraged world opinion.

Aug. 25. The Japanese naval blockade of South China was extended (Sept. 5) to the entire coast, but Tsingtao, Hongkong, Macao, and Kwangchou were excepted, out of consideration for foreign powers.

Aug. 29. Conclusion of a non-aggression treaty between China and Soviet Russia. This led to the sale of military aircraft to China and to shipment of large quantities of munitions after Oct. 5-6. The League of Nations and the United States condemned the action of Japan. A conference of the powers at Brussels (Nov. 15) failed to effect mediation.

Nov. 20. The Chinese capital was moved from Nanking to Chungking (Ch'ung-ch'ing), though the executive power was, for the time being, established at Hankow.

Dec. 12. The Panay incident: attack of Japanese bombers upon American and British ships near Nanking produced acute tension between the powers. The United States government ultimately accepted Japanese explanations, but the Japanese government continued a high-handed policy toward foreign property and rights in China and evaded all protests from the United States, Great Britain, and France. The dangerous situation in Europe enabled the Japanese to pursue their aims without running serious risk of interventions.

Dec. 13. FALL OF NANKING, after heavy fighting. Horrible atrocities committed by the Japanese troops. The Chinese fell back, denying the Japanese a decision. The first six months of the war had demonstrated to an astonished world the moral unity of the Chinese people. All factions, including the Communists, acted on the orders of the central government. Chiang had the country behind him in the announced purpose of making no compromise at the expense of Chinese territory or independence.

Dec. 24. The Japanese took Hangchow and, advancing from the north, occupied Tsinan (Dec. 27).

1938, Jan. 10. Capture of Tsingtao by the Japanese, after the Chinese had destroyed the Japanese mills in that area. The Japanese then began the advance south along the Hankow Railway and through Shansi. They reached the Yellow River

(Mar. 6), but mobile Chinese forces restricted the Japanese to the railway zone. More and more it became evident that the Japanese could capture the large cities and important communications, but that the countryside would remain in the hands of the Chinese guerrillas. During the spring of 1938 the Japanese forces suffered several reverses at the hands of the Chinese.

Mar. 28. The Japanese installed a Reformed Government of the Republic of China at Nanking, thus repeating the technique employed earlier in Manchukuo.

May. Resumption of the Japanese advance. They took Amoy (May 10), Suchow (May 20), Kaifeng (June 6), and Anking (June 12).

July 11-Aug. 10. Clash of Russian and Japanese forces at Changkufeng Hill, on the border between Siberian, Manchukuan, and Korean territory. After severe fighting a truce was finally arranged for, the Russians retaining their position.

Sept. 22. Creation of a United Council for China at Peking, under Japanese auspices. The Japanese made less and less of a secret of their intention to overthrow Chiang and his Nationalist régime and to transform China into a Japanese protectorate, as part of the projected "new order" in the Far East.

Oct. 12. The Japanese landed forces at Bias Bay, near Hongkong, evidently intending to realize on the acute crisis in Europe arising from the Czechoslovak affair (p. 965). They advanced inland and on Oct. 21. THE JAPANESE TOOK CANTON, almost without a struggle. The city had been mercilessly bombed for months and a large part of the population had already fled. Capture of the city enabled the Japanese to cut the Canton-Hankow Railway, the most important line for transportation of supplies from abroad to the Chinese forces in the interior.

Oct. 25. FALL OF HANKOW to the Japanese. The Chinese government and army withdrew up the Yangtze to Chungking. Japanese control over the Yangtze below Hankow became ever more rigid, leading to repeated and insistent protests on the part of the western powers. The American secretary, Hull, reasserted the validity of the Nine-Power Treaty (Nov. 4) and was supported in his attitude by the British government. But protests made only the slightest impression in Tökyö.

1939. The fighting continued in an inconclusive fashion over a large area.

There was no indication of any slackening of Chinese determination, and the government of Chiang continued to receive supplies from Russia and other powers, even by the most devious routes. Both the United States and Britain made substantial loans to the nationalist government. The Japanese, unable to force a decision, developed an indirect attack on the position of foreign powers in China, demanding larger share in the Shanghai international concession and challenging foreign rights everywhere.

June 14. The Japanese established a blockade of the British concession at Tientsin (and incidentally also of the French), following refusal of the British authorities to surrender four Chinese accused of terrorism. Japanese spokesmen publicly announced that Britain must give up support of the Chinese nationalist régime and must co-operate with Japan in establishing the "new order" in the Far East.

11. JAPAN

1914-1918. THE FIRST WORLD WAR.

During the war Japan manufactured and sent to Europe large quantities of munitions (especially to Russia). At the same time Japanese merchants took advantage of the conflict to supplant German commerce in eastern Asia.

1914, Nov. 7. Kiao-chow surrendered to the Japanese after a two months' siege (p. 918).

1915, Jan. 18. JAPAN SUBMITTED TO CHINA TWENTY-ONE DEMANDS (p. 1117), initiating the policy of subordinating China and establishing Japanese preponderance in the Far East.

Mar. 25. General election resulted in a victory for the government and the policy of vigorous imperialism.

July 30. Okuma ministry resigned because of bribery charges, but in Aug. Okuma formed a new ministry.

Oct. 19. Japan formally joined the Pact of London (Sept. 5, 1914) binding herself not to conclude a separate peace.

1916, July 3. Russo-Japanese Convention signed, by which Russia agreed to the extension of Japanese influence in China under agreements of 1915, and Japan recognized the Russian advance into Outer Mongolia.

Sept. 3. Fresh demands on China, increasing Japanese rights in South Manchuria and Inner Mongolia, followed a clash between Japanese and Chinese troops at Chêng-chia-tun (Aug.). Agreed to by China (Feb. 1917).

Oct. 9. Count Terauchi succeeded Ökuma as premier, with a slight minority in the lower house.

1917, Apr. 20. The general election proved a victory for the government.

Nov. 2. Notes were exchanged with the United States (Lansing-Ishii Agreement) by which the latter recognized the special interests of Japan in China and Japan gave pledges of good faith in the maintenance of Chinese integrity, independence, and the "open door."

1918, Apr. 5. British and Japanese marines landed at Vladivostok.

May 16. Sino-Japanese Treaty (p. 1118).
July 6. Allied commanders took command of Vladivostok. An announcement of intervention (Aug. 3) was issued.

Sept. 29. The Terauchi ministry resigned because of inability to cope with unrest caused largely by high prices resulting from war boom.

Hara (first commoner premier) succeeded.

1919, Jan. 18. Peace Conference opened.
Japan was favorable to the League of Nations, but her demand for a statement as to racial equality was refused.

Feb. 14. Acrimonious debate on universal suffrage in the Diet. The franchise then was limited to men over 25 paying a direct tax of 3 yen, thus excluding agricultural and industrial labor. Organized demonstrations in Tökyö and dissolution of the Diet (Feb. 26) followed.

Apr. Rioting and open rebellion in Korea was mercilessly suppressed. There followed a revision of the Korean government substituting civil for military control and promising larger powers of self-government when the Koreans abandoned their independence movement.

Mar. 25. A reform act increased the electorate from 1,500,000 to 3,000-

May 10. A general election with the universal suffrage issue dominant resulted in 283 seats for the government party (Seiyūkai), which was opposed to it, 108 for the Kenseikai, and 68 for other parties.

Japanese Emperors since the Restoration

1919. There was considerable industrial unrest and many strikes throughout the year.

1920, Jan. 10. Formal peace with Germany by exchange of ratifications. Japan, after initial satisfaction, became chagrined over the failure to secure recognition of Japan's special position in the Far East.

Dec. 17. Japan received as mandates from the League of Nations the former German islands of the Pacific north of the equator (Caroline, Marshall, and Marianas [Ladrone] archipelagoes).

Dec. 31. The First imperial census revealed population of 55,961,140 (including Sakhalin, Formosa, and Korea, 77,005,112).

1921, Mar.-Aug. The world tour of the crown prince, Hirohito, marked the first time a member of the imperial family had been abroad.

Nov. 4. Murder of Premier Hara by a political fanatic.

Nov. 12. Viscount Takahashi premier.

Nov. 12—1922, Feb. 6. Washington Conference (p. 957). Prince Tokugawa, Adm. Katō, and Baron Shidehara were the Japanese delegates. Nov. 25. Crown Prince Hirohito constituted regent because of illness of the emperor.

1922, Feb. 11. Yap Treaty signed with the United States (p. 1050).

Feb. 23. Serious riots over universal suffrage.

June 2. Ratification of the Sino-Japanese Agreement on Shantung, resulting in more friendly relations with China and return of Kiaochow (Dec. 10).

June 11. Adm. Baron Katō succeeded Takahashi as premier.

July 6. Washington treaties ratified by Japan; naval budget reduced by 117,000,000 yen.

Sept. 6-24. The Ch'ang-ch'un Conference with Russia was a failure and Japan continued to occupy North Sakhalin.

Oct. The last of Japanese troops embarked from Siberia.

1923, Mar. 2. Universal Suffrage Bill defeated. Motion of opposition to impeach the government followed by wild scenes; Diet prorogued.

Aug. 28. Count Yamamoto succeeded Kato as premier.

Sept. 1. Great Tökyö earthquake followed by great fires in Tökyö, Yokohama, and neighboring cities, tidal waves and repeated shocks. 200,000 estimated killed; $1,000,000,000 estimated losses. Relief sent from abroad, particularly the United States. Program of modern reconstruction immediately commenced, financed by loans placed at home and abroad.

Dec. 29. Resignation of the ministry following an attack on the life of the prince regent; Viscount Kiyoura premier.

1924, Apr.-June. High feeling aroused by the American abrogation of the gentlemen's agreement and total exclusion of Japanese. Demonstrations and boycotts of American goods.

May 10. General election held; defeat for Kiyoura ministry; Katō premier and Baron Shidehara foreign minister (June 1924-Apr. 1927), with conciliatory policy toward China.

1925, Jan. 20. Russo-Japanese Convention (negotiated from Aug. 7, 1924, by Karakhan and Yoshizawa in Peking) re-established diplomatic relations: Russia recognized the Treaty of Portsmouth of 1905; the Fisheries Convention of 1907 was to be revised (new convention signed at Moscow Jan. 23, 1928); Japan received oil and coal concessions in North Sakhalin and agreed to evacuate her troops. This and subsidiary agreements formed a general settlement of issues between the two countries.

Mar. Bill passed granting universal male suffrage; voters increased from 3 to 14 million.

1926, Jan. 28. Premier Kato died and was succeeded by the new leader of the Kenseikai, Wakatsuki, the second commoner to become premier.

Dec. 25. The Taishō emperor died, and the prince regent succeeded. The year period was changed to Shōwa, marking the beginning of THE SHŌWA PERIOD.

After a few more years of the liberalism and internationalism of the Taishō period, a sudden strong militaristic and imperialistic reaction set in after the Mukden incident (1931). There was a partial repudiation of the intellectual and cultural aspects of Occidental civilization and a revival of older Japanese ideologies. Politicians lost their influence, and the army and, to a lesser extent, the navy became the dominant forces in the government, with the peasantry supporting the military against the city bourgeoisie and the capitalists. Under this leadership the nation embarked on a daring program of territorial expansion on the continent. Meanwhile, Japanese industry was growing rapidly, and Japanese manufactured goods began to flood the world market.

1927. Serious bank crisis, caused partly by huge loans for relief and reconstruction.

Apr. 17. Fall of Wakatsuki ministry; Gen. Baron Tanaka, leader of the Seiyūkai, became premier and foreign minister (until July 2, 1929), pursuing a "positive" policy toward China.

May-June. Japanese intervention in Shantung blocked the northward advance of Chinese Nationalist forces upon Peking.

1928. Apr. Japan again intervened in Shantung, leading to

May 3-11. Sino-Japanese clashes at Tsinan: Japan temporarily seized control of railways in Shantung; Chinese boycott movement against Japan lasted for over a year; incident settled Mar. 28, 1929; China to pay damages but not indemnity; Japanese troops withdrawn May 20, 1929.

1929. Growth of labor unions, begun particularly during 1915–1920, reached a total of 600 associations with a third of a million members; increase of labor disputes (576 in 1929).

July 2. Fall of the Tanaka ministry; cabinet formed under Hamaguchi of Minseitö; Shidehara returned as foreign minister.

1930. The population, which had been estimated at 26.5 million in 1726 and 34.8 million in 1872, doubled in following 63 years (69.2 million in 1935), the rate of increase accelerating steadily to a peak of 15.3 per thousand in 1930 before beginning to decline (14.4 in 1935). This rate of increase (c. 1 million a year by 1930) created a problem because of the high density of Japanese population already in the late Tokugawa period before the increase began. Public concern over the population question after 1922 and failure of emigration to provide a solution (total of all emigrants in modern period up to 1930 estimated to have been less than annual increase in 1930) led to emphasis on manufacturing and foreign trade as means to provide employment.

May 6. Sino-Japanese tariff agreement signed at Nanking by which Japan recognized China's tariff autonomy and received certain commercial safeguards and recognition of Japanese loans to former Chinese governments.

Oct. Sapanese ratification of the London Naval Treaty (signed Apr. 22) following acrimonious debate in which the Seiyūkai attacked the policy of Hamaguchi and Shidehara.

Nov. 14. Premier Hamaguchi shot by an assassin in Tōkyō and succeeded by 1931, Apr. Wakatsuki, new leader of the Minseitō as premier.

Sept. 19. MUKDEN INCIDENT (p. 1119). Following Sino-Korean disorders at Wan-pao-shan (Kirin Province), the execution by Chinese of a Japanese major (Nakamura, June 27), and anti-Chinese riots in Korea, on the night of Sept. 18–19 Japanese troops in southern Manchuria seized Mukden and other strategic points and expelled the Chinese forces.

Dec. Fall of Wakatsuki ministry; cabinet formed by Inukai, leader of the Seiyūkai; Gen. Araki war minister.

1932, Jan. 28-Mar. 2. Sino-Japanese hostilities at Shanghai (p. 1120), precipitated by Japanese demonstration against the Chinese boycott (agreement signed May 5).

Feb. 18. Independence of Manchukuo (p. 1120).

May 15. Assassination of Premier Inukai by military reactionaries. A ministry chiefly of non-party members was formed under Adm. Viscount Saitō (later governor-general of Korea); Gen. Araki war minister, Takahashi finance minister. This marked the end of party government in Japan.

The abandonment of the gold standard (late 1931) led to depreciation of the yen in terms of foreign currencies and stimulated Japanese export trade. This led to the erection of tariff and quota barriers abroad.

1933, May 27. Following the report to the League of Nations of the Lytton Commission, Japan announced her withdrawal from the League (to take effect in two years).

May 31. Japanese invasion of Jehol (Jan.-Mar.) led to a truce signed at T'ang-ku which created a demilitarized zone in eastern Hopei under Japanese domination.

1934, Apr. 18. Foreign-office statement asserting virtual Japanese protectorate over Chinese relations with western powers.

July 7. Saito ministry succeeded by that of Adm. Okada. Hirota continued as foreign minister (appointed Sept. 1933).

- 1935, June 9. Ho-Umezu Agreement (Japanese demands accepted in writing July 6 by Gen. Ho Yingch'in): China obliged to withdraw troops and cease anti-Japanese activities in Hopei.
- Oct. 28. Enunciation of Foreign Minister Hirota's three points: establishment of a Japan-China-Manchukuo bloc, suppression of anti-Japanese activities in China, organization of a joint Sino-Japanese front against communism.
 - Nov. Failure of Japanese effort to create an autonomous North China. Instead, an "East Hopei Autonomous Council" was created (Nov. 25). This led to student demonstrations in Peking (Dec.).

1936, Feb. 20. In the election, the Liberal Mineseitō regained the leading position in the diet.

Feb. 26. Assassination of Viscount Saitō, Finance Minister Takahashi, and others in an uprising of young army officers at Tōkyō aiming at military dictatorship. Seventeen of the rebels were sentenced to death (July 7) by a military Mar. 9. Hirota became premier, forming a cabinet dominated by the military (Gen. Terauchi); budget greatly increased; development of heavy industry pushed.

Nov. 25. German-Japanese anti-Communist Pact (p. 964).

1937, Jan. 23. Fall of the Hirota cabinet; Gen. Ugaki prevented by army leaders (Terauchi, Sugiyama) from forming a cabinet; Feb. 2 Gen. Hayashi formed a cabinet.

Apr. 30. General election went in opposition to the Hayashi ministry, which finally resigned May 31. Prince Konoye formed a "national union" cabinet with Hirota foreign minister, Sugiyama war minister (June 3).

July 7. SINO-JAPANESE HOSTILI-TIES (p. 1121).

Establishment of cabinet advisory council (Oct.) and imperial headquarters (Nov.) centralized the conduct of the war in the hands of the military and naval leaders, acting under direct authority of the emperor. Persons suspected of liberal or radical tendencies were arrested (371 on Dec. 14).

Nov. 3. Opening of the Brussels Conference, of powers connected with the Nine-Power Pact, except Japan; this failed to inaugurate negotiations to end the hostilities in China.

Nov. 6. Italy adhered to the German-Japanese anti-Communist Pact and recognized Manchukuo.

1938, Mar. 26. Passage of the National Mobilization Bill allowing state dictation of almost all phases of economic life (application of the law began May 5). Regular budget and war budget passed, totaling 8,365,000,000 yen.

May 26. Reorganization of the cabinet, military and naval officers taking six portfolios; Gen. Ugaki foreign minister.

Sept. 29. Resignation of Gen. Ugaki as foreign minister.

29. Arita appointed Japanese foreign minister.

1939, Jan. 4. Resignation of Prince Konoye as premier; he was succeeded by Baron Hiranuma, who formed a cabinet including Konoye.

Apr. 2. A sharp dispute between Russia and Japan over fishing rights was settled by agreement for one year, Japan to participate on Soviet terms in auction of the fishing areas.

May. Outbreak of serious fighting between Manchukuan and Mongolian forces on the Mongolian frontier. The conflict, really one between Russia and Japan, assumed considerable dimensions in the course of the summer. At the same time Japanese relations with England were brought almost to the breaking point as a result of Japanese action at Tientsin (p. 1123). But

Aug. 23. Conclusion of the German-Russian Pact (p. 966) proved a tremendous shock to Japan, which at once scrapped the Anti-Communist Pact and resumed freedom of action.

Aug. 28. The Hiranuma cabinet resigned and a new ministry under Gen. Abe was formed to put the new policy into effect.

G. THE PACIFIC AREA

1. GENERAL

In the early months of the First World War, British ships with Australian and New Zealand forces, conquered the German island colonies south of the equator, while in Oct. 1914 the Japanese took possession of those north of the equator (the Mariannes, Carolines, and Marshalls). At the end of the war, Japanese, Australians, and New Zealanders all favored outright annexation of these territories, but because of American objections, they were finally classified as C mandates.

1919, May 7. The supreme council assigned German New Guinea and the neighboring German islands (Bismarck Archipelago) as a mandate to Australia;
German Samoa (West Samoa) became a New Zealand mandate; the rich phosphate island of Nauru was mandated to the British Empire and by agreement the administration was divided between Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand: Japan received the German islands north of the equator as a mandate. These arrangements were confirmed by the League of Nations
Dec. 17, 1920.

1920-1922. The dispute about Yap between the United States and Japan.
Yap was an important cable station and, according to the American view, had been excluded from the Japanese mandate and reserved for later arrangement. After much debate the matter was settled by agreement of Feb. 11, 1922, by which the island was recognized as part of the Japanese mandate, while the United States secured cable and radio rights.

1921, Dec. 13. THE PACIFIC TREATY, concluded by Great Britain, the United States, France, and Japan during the Washington Conference (p. 957) involved a reciprocal guaranty of possessions in the Pacific, while 1922, Feb. 6. The Naval Treaty between the five great powers included an engagement to maintain the status quo with regard to fortifications and naval bases in the Pacific (the American and Alaskan coasts not included).

1922, Apr. The Japanese government established civil government in the mandated islands (1400 islands with a total area of only 836 square miles, scattered over an immense area). The capital was set up at Korror Island (Palau group) and six branches of government were established in the major island groups. Much was done for sanitation, etc. For the rest the Japanese have ruled through appointed native headmen. Economically the development of the sugar industry has been most important. It has brought with it a considerable influx of Japanese immigrants (1933: native population 50,000; Japanese 32,000).

1933, May 27. Japan announced withdrawal from the League of Nations, to become effective in two years' time. At the same time the Japanese government made it clear that it had no intention of abandoning the mandate. Since the sovereignty in the mandates had never been very clear, the Japanese position was not seriously challenged.

1936, Jan. 1. With the expiration of the international naval limitation treaties, the provisions for the maintenance of the status quo of fortifications in the Pacific fell to the ground. Since 1932 there had been rumors of Japanese fortifications and submarine bases. After 1935 Australia and New Zealand were very active in coastal preparations and the United States government projected a great scheme of fortifications extending from the Alaskan coast and the Aleutian Islands to Midway Island, Guam, and Samoa.

2. AUSTRALIA

The outbreak of the First World War revealed all Australian parties united in loyalty to the mother country and in readiness to contribute in its defense. During the war Australia sent 329,000 men overseas, who took a prominent part in the Dardanelles campaign, the Palestine campaign, and the fighting in France (after 1916). In May 1918 the five Australian divisions in France were organized as an Australian army corps, under the command of Sir John Monash, an Australian. The war was financed chiefly by borrowing and was accompanied, in Australia as elsewhere, by a great extension of government control, economic as well as political. Rising prices together with decline in real wages led to much labor unrest and a very extensive strike in Aug-Sept. 1917. The failure of this strike resulted in stricter organization of the trade unions and greater concentration on economic rather than political aims. In the military field the Australian government took advantage of the opportunity to seize the German island colonies south of the equator.

1914, Sept. 5. The general elections resulted in a great victory for the Labor Party and in the formation (Sept. 17) of the third Fisher cabinet. In 1915 Mr. Fisher became high commissioner in London and his place was taken by 1915, Oct. 27. William M. Hughes as premier and leader of the Labor Party. Hughes, a very dynamic person, became the embodiment of Australian and British patriotism, and, after a visit to England in the summer of 1916, began to advocate conscription of men for service overseas. The suggestion roused much opposition among some of his colleagues, but by a narrow margin in a popular referendum. The result was an open rift in the Labor Party, which ejected Hughes and several of his colleagues. The cabinet was reconstructed and ultimately 1917, Feb. 17. Hughes organized a National War Government, relying on the new Nationalist Party which was composed of Labor leaders who followed Hughes and by a large section of the Liberal opposition. The new party received a popular mandate in the elections of May.

Oct. 17. Completion of the railroad from Port Augusta to Kaigoorlie, thus first attaching West Australia by rail to the other states.

In order to meet the steady decline in voluntary enlistment, the prime minister, unwilling to enforce conscription by parliamentary action, decided to refer the matter once more to popular vote, but 1918, Jan. 10. Conscription was again defeated by referendum. Through the exertions of influential leaders voluntary enlistment was increased to some extent, but not enough to satisfy Hughes and his associates. In the summer of 1918 Hughes went to England and in the spring of 1919 took part in the Paris Peace Conference. There, with the support of the other Dominion statesmen, he succeeded in excluding from the covenant of the League of Nations any recognition of the principle of race equality. At the same time he intervened actively in the problem of the German colonies, so that on

1919, May 7. THE SUPREME COUNCIL ASSIGNED TO AUSTRALIA
THE MANDATE FOR THE GERMAN COLONIES SOUTH OF THE EQUATOR, excepting Nauru Island and Samoa (which went to New Zealand). This arrangement was confirmed by the League Dec. 17, 1920.
By agreement with England and New Zealand (July 2, 1919) Australia was given the administration of Nauru Island, which the three held together as mandatories.

Dec. 10. Sir Ross Smith arrived at Port Darwin by air, completing the flight from England in 27 days.

Dec. 23. The elections resulted in a victory for the Nationalist Party and the Hughes government continued in power.

1920, Jan. 10. Australia became an original member of the League of Nations with the full status of an independent nation.

1920. In a famous decision (Engineers' case) the Australian high court gave the commonwealth conciliation and arbitration court authority to regulate the conditions of labor of state employees. Thereby the commonwealth government secured preponderance over the state governments, a process already prepared by the expanded activity of the federal government during the war, the extension of its taxing power (income tax, inheritance tax), 1921, Dec. 15. Adoption of a higher tariff, chiefly to protect the industries. that had been born of the war. All parties were more or less united on the tariff issue. At the same time a tariff board, consisting of experts, was set up to advise the government. This board ultimately secured considerable power over the schedule of duties.

1922. By the Empire Settlement Act, the British government undertook to assist in the promotion of emigration to Australia and in the settlement of emigrants on the land.

pec. 10. The elections resulted in 27 seats for the Nationalist Party, 29 for Labor and 14 for the Country Party (founded 1919), led by Dr. Earle Page and representing the farmer element. The Country Party held the balance of power and, being hostile to Hughes, finally forced the 1923, Feb. 3. Resignation of the Hughes government. The Nationalist Party began to disintegrate and composed of Nationalists and Country Party men.

1925, Sept. 23. A new immigration restriction act gave the governorgeneral authority to prohibit the entrance of aliens of any specified nationality, class, race, or occupation, either for economic or racial reasons. This act was never systematically applied, but it made possible restriction of Italian immigration, which had begun to arouse objections, especially among the labor groups.

1926. The Northern Territory was divided along 20° S.L. into Northern Australia and Central Australia, and a commission was set up to study possibilities of development.

1927, May 9. Parliament House was officially opened at Canberra. Thus far Parliament had sat at Melbourne while numerous schemes for the new capital were under debate. In a competition among architects, W. B. Griffin of Chicago received first prize and his plan became the basis for the new city.

June 8. Financial agreement between the commonwealth government and the state governments, following years of dispute concerning continued federal support to the states (the federal government having gradually absorbed most of the best springs of revenue). The federal government had already (Apr. 8) discontinued the per capita payments introduced in 1910. It now agreed to take over the state debts, which were to be liquidated within 58 years. In the interval the states were to pay part of the interest. A loan council was established to control future government borrowing, state as well as federal. In a short time this council established an effective control over much government expenditure, especially for development.

1928, June 9. Capt. Charles Kingsford-Smith arrived at Brisbane after his trans-Pacific flight from California.

1929, Oct. 12. The Labor Party won a resounding victory in the elections, whereupon

Oct. 22. James H. Scullin formed a Labor cabinet. For the most part Labor had remained extremely moderate in its policy, though in 1921 the party had adopted a program of socialization, and though in 1927 the Council of Trade Unions had been organized as a Left-Wing group associated with Moscow.

Nov. 1. Compulsory military service was given up and the voluntary system resumed, partly for reasons of economy, partly as an expression of Labor's pacifistic outlook.

1930The great depression made itself acutely felt in Australia, where the government tried to combat it by drastic economy and other obvious devices. The rising price of gold and (after 1933) of wool, however, enabled Australia to recover more readily than many other countries.

1931. Foundation of the United Australia Party, composed of a number of dissident Laborites together with remnants of the Nationalist Party.
The leader of the group was Joseph A. Lyons.

Dec. 19. The Labor Party was badly defeated in the elections, and a new Lyons cabinet was formed.

1932. The Financial Agreement Enforcement Act further strengthened the power of the federal government as against the states. The Labor premier of New South Wales, Lang, had refused (Apr. 1931) to pay his state's interest assessment to the federal government. The new enforcement act gave the federal treasurer power to take over certain revenues of a defaulting state. This was done in the case of New South Wales, thus precipitating the downfall of Lang's ministry.

1933, Apr. 8. West Australia voted 2-1 to secede from the commonwealth. Together with South Australia and Tasmania, the other agricultural states, West Australia had long protested against the "incidence of federation" and had demanded abatement of taxes or some form of federal relief. The government thereupon appointed a grants commission to investigate the claims of aggrieved states and to decide on compensation. Meanwhile (1934, Mar.) West Australia sent a petition to the king asking for legislation to effect secession. The British Parliament, however, refused to accept the petition without the previous approval of the Australian people as a whole.

May 26. The Australian government assumed authority over about one-third of the Antarctic continent (an area roughly the size of Australia itself).

1934, July 25. The government adopted a three-year defense program which involved the development of an air force, increase of naval power, mechanization of forces, etc. This program was later extended as international tension increased.

Nov. 7. The Lyons cabinet was replaced by a Lyons-Page combination, representing a coalition between the United Australia Party and the Country Party.

Dec. 8. Inauguration of a weekly airmail service between England and Australia.

1936, May 23. A new and higher tariff was introduced, to replace the somewhat more modest tariff of 1932. The new schedule led to considerable friction with Japan, whose textiles were hard hit, but by an agreement of Dec. 27 the Australian government agreed to take as many Japanese textile products as in 1934, in return for Japanese purchase of a specified amount of Australian wool.

1937, Oct. 23. The Lyons-Page government won a sound victory in the elections (United Australia Party 28 seats; Country Party 17; Labor 29). The outstanding issue of the elections was the defense problem, the government advancing a program of naval construction, Labor calling for emphasis on air-armaments and less dependence on Great Britain. Australian expenditure for defense reached a record high in 1937.

1938, Oct. 25. The Duke of Kent was named as governor-general of Australia, the appointment reflecting the ever stronger attachment of the Dominion to the mother country as the international situation worsened.

1939, Apr. 7. Death of Premier Lyons, who was succeeded by Sir Earle Page.

Apr. 24. R. G. Menzies formed a new government which devoted itself wholeheartedly to the problem of defense. When (Sept. 3), England declared war on Germany, Australia unhesitatingly joined the mother country and arranged for assistance of all kinds.

3. NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand, like Australia, supported Great Britain enthusiastically throughout the First World War. Though conscription was introduced (Aug. 1, 1916), the great majority of men sent overseas (117,000) were volunteers. Together with the Australian forces they formed the Anzac divisions at Gallipoli and later took part in the French and Palestine campaigns. At home the war led to increased government control, both political and economic.

1914, Aug. 29. German Samoa surrendered to an expeditionary force from New Zealand, accompanied by the battle cruiser Australia and other British warships.

1915, Aug. 12. The cabinet of W. F. Massey (Reform Party) was reorganized as a national war cabinet through association of the Liberal Party (Joseph Ward, leader).

1919, May 7. The supreme war council assigned Samoa as a mandate to New Zealand, which shared with Great Britain and Australia the mandate for the rich phosphate island of Nauru as well. The New Zealanders would have preferred to have Great Britain assume the Samoan mandate, if only to avoid the problem of further colored populations.

Aug. 25. End of the coalition government. Massey and the Reform Party resumed the government, and in the elections of Dec. 17 secured a substantial majority in the legislature. The elections of 1922 and 1925 produced essentially the same results.

1920, Jan. 10. New Zealand became an original member of the League of Nations.

1925, May 10. Death of the prime minister. He was succeeded by Joseph G. Coates.

1927, July-Oct. Troubles in Samoa, where the native chiefs complained against the administration. An investigating commission vindicated the government and reported that the natives were instigated by Europeans. The government then proceeded to repatriate objectionable Europeans (Germans), whose properties were taken over.

1928, Nov. 14. In the elections the Reform Party was defeated by the United (i.e. Liberal) Party: Reform 28 seats; United 29; Labor 19.

Dec. 10. Sir Joseph G. Ward, leader of the United Party, formed a cabinet.

1930, May 28. George W. Forbes (United Party) became premier on the retirement of Ward for reasons of health.

New Zealand suffered very severely from the world depression, being essentially a producer of primary materials. The fall of prices and unemployment drove the government to a policy of drastic curtailment of expenditure (including salaries), restriction of imports, exchange control, conversion of the debt, etc. During the most critical years much of the famous social machinery was allowed to fall into disuse (notably wage and hour provisions, etc.). As a result the Labor Party withdrew its support from the government.

1931, May 19. Military training was returned to a voluntary basis, for reasons of economy.

Sept. 18. A coalition was effected between the United and Reform Parties, Mr. Coates entering the government. In the elections of Dec. 2 the government won a pronounced victory.

1935, Nov. 27. The Labor Party for the first time won a majority in the elections (Labor 53 seats; United and Reform Parties 20; Independents 7). Thereupon Michael J. Savage formed the first Labor cabinet (Dec. 5). The Labor Party came into power with an elaborate program of socialization and social reform. During the years 1935-1938 the major part of the program was translated into legislation. The chief measures were:

Nationalization of the Reserve Bank. All share capital was abolished and private shareholders paid off. The government thereby secured full control of the currency and of the country's credit.

By the Primary Products Marketing Act the government arranged to buy farm produce at a guaranteed price and dispose of it in London at the best available figure. Deficits were to be made up from reserve bank credit.

The State Advances Corporation Act remodeled the mortgage corporation as a state institution designed to liberalize government lending activities.

The Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Amendment Act restored the compulsory arbitration system in disputes about wages and hours.

The Government Railways Amendment Act restored the railroads to complete government control and regulated road transport companies to prevent competition with railroads.

The arbitration court in 1936 fixed the basic wage for a man with wife and three children at £3 16s. per week.

1937, May 13. Formation of the National Party, a merger of the old Reform and United Parties, under leadership of Adam Hamilton. The new party was opposed primarily to the socializing policy of the government and presented a program of private enterprise and initiative.

1938, Oct. 15. In the elections the Labor government managed to retain its majority intact (Labor 54 seats; National Party 24).

1939, Sept. 3. British declaration of war on Germany. New Zealand, like Australia, at once decided on full support of the home country.

THE PHILIPPINES 4.

1916, Feb. 4. National Bank of the Philippines chartered and made the depository of public funds. A council of state was created, composed of the governor-general, the presidents of both houses of the legislature, and the heads of executive departments.

Aug. 29. JONES ACT, abolishing the Philippine Commission and creating an elective senate of 24 members; greater powers vested in the Philippine government. Ultimate independence was promised as soon as stable government was established. As interpreted by Gov. Harrison, this act gave the islands practical autonomy.

1917, Apr. 25. A Filipino national guard was organized and its services offered to the United States.

1918, Nov. 20. A Filipino division was taken into federal service.

1919, Mar. 6. Use of the Spanish language in the courts was continued until

A delegation of forty prominent Filipinos, including Manuel Quezon, arrived in the United States and asked for the fulfillment of promises of independence.

1920, Dec. 15. The legislature passed a bill providing 1,000,000 pesos annually to defray the expenses of the "independence commission."

1921, May 4, Sept. 12. The Wood-Forbes Mission, sent to investigate conditions in the islands. Its report declared that an immediate grant of independence would be "a betrayal of the Philippine people" and that "under no circumstances should the American government permit to be established in the Philippines a situation which would leave the United States in a position of responsibility without authority."

Oct. 5. Gen. Leonard Wood, governorgeneral.

1923, July 2. Manuel Quezon, president of the Senate, accused the governor of undue interference. July 17 the Filipino members of the council of state resigned for the same reason. The United States gov-ernment, however, upheld the official acts of the governor.

1924, Feb. The insular auditor refused to honor vouchers for the funds of the independence commission, declaring it illegal.

Mar. 6. President Coolidge stated by letter: "The Philippine people are by no means equipped, either in wealth or experience, to undertake the heavy burden which would be imposed upon them with political independence."

May 6. A special mission, under Quezon, arrived in Washington and the Philippine legislature (Nov. 19) adopted a resolution demanding full and complete independence.

1925, Dec. 7. A petition from the legislature, demanding independence, presented to Congress.

1926, July 26. The legislature adopted a resolution calling for a plebiscite on independence. This was vetoed by the governor.

Dec. 7. Report of Carmi Thompson, sent to investigate conditions. He recommended that independence be postponed, but that the policy of home rule be extended and that the Philippine government should continue to liquidate its business enterprises.

1927, Aug. 7. Death of Gov. Wood. Henry L. Stimson appointed to succeed him (Dec. 13) and adopted a conciliatory policy.

1929, May 17. Dwight F. Davis, governorgeneral.

Earlier American opinion in favor of independence gradually became reinforced by economic considerations: (1) American economic conquest of the islands had not made great headway; (2) the American stake in the islands remained small; (3) the desire of the American sugar interests to be freed from competition of Philippine sugar. When the Smoot-Hawley Tariff was under consideration, Senator King of Utah and Senator Broussard of Louisiana introduced amendments calling for Philippine independence. These were defeated, however.

1931. Oct. President Hoover declared that "economic independence of the Philippines must be attained before political independence can be successful."

1933, Jan. 13. THE HOWES-CUTTING
BILL passed over the president's veto. It provided for a transitional commonwealth for a period of 12 years, under a Filipino executive. The United States was to retain the right to military and naval bases and decisions of the Philippine courts were to be subject to review by the United States supreme court. During the probationary period tariffs were to be imposed on Philippine sugar, coconut oil and fibers when introduced into the United States in excess of specific quotas. The Philippine legislature was to accept the independence measure within one.year.

Oct. The Philippine legislature rejected the proposed plan on the ground that it was not an independence bill, but a tariff against Philippine products and an immigration bill against Philippine labor.

1934, Mar. 2. President Roosevelt urged Congress to revive the HowesCutting Bill, with removal of the provision for American military reservations on the islands, and naval bases made subject to further negotiations.

Mar. 24. THE TYDINGS-McDUFFIE

ACT adopted. It was essentially the Howes-Cutting Bill modified in accordance with the president's recommendations. The Philippine legislature, with misgivings, accepted the measure (May

July 30. A constitutional convention convened to frame a constitution for the commonwealth. It completed its task Feb. 8, 1935, and President Roosevelt approved the document Mar. 23.

1935, May 14. The constitution was accepted by the voters of the islands.

Sept. 17. Elections to choose a president, vice-president, and national assembly. Manuel Quezon, first president.

COMMONWEALTH GOV-Nov. 15. ERNMENT FORMALLY ES-TABLISHED. The president (elected for 6 years) enjoyed most of the powers of the governor-general. The legislature (National Assembly) was unicameral. United States retained control of defense and foreign relations, exercised supervision over important phases of finance, and reserved the right to intervene to preserve the commonwealth government. Appeals from decisions of the Philippine courts might be carried to the United States Supreme Court.

Growth of opposition to President Quezon and his policy, linked with loud demands for immediate independence, in 1937, Feb.-Mar. Brought President Quezon to the United States for conferences on the working of the independence act. He suggested independence in 1938 or 1939 in order to prevent the economic difficulties bound to arise from prolonged uncertainty. The United States government agreed to the establishment of a joint preparatory committee, composed of six Americans and six Filipinos. While this committee pursued its investigations, the outbreak of the Sino Japanese conflict produced a reversion of feeling among the more conservative groups in the Philippines. Growing discussion of permanent Dominion status under American sovereignty as the only effective method of defense. President Quezon was rather favorable to this view, which was opposed by various opposition groups.

1938, May 20. Report of the joint committee. It recommended that the American tariff should be gradually extended to the Philippines, to become completely effective only in 1960 (instead of 1946).

Nov. 8. In the elections President Quezon's Nationalist Party won a decisive victory over the united opposition groups (Popular Front). The opposition, while bitterly criticizing Quezon for his dictatorial methods and infringements of civil rights, demanded independence in 1046, but no longer called for "immediate" independence, for which most Filipinos seemed to have lost the taste.

HAWAII

Hawaii has become more and more the key to the American strategic position in The naval base at Pearl the Pacific. Harbor, one of the finest deep water basins in the world, has been steadily developed since the channel was cleared and straightened in 1908-1910. Aug. 21, 1919, the great drydock was finally completed and there is now every facility for supplying and repairing warships.

Sugar and pineapple plantations comprise the main wealth of the islands, though the tourist trade has become of great economic importance. The population is extremely mixed, the figures for 1940 being: Hawaiian and part Hawaiian, 64,310; Caucasian, 103,791; Chinese, 28,774; Filipinos, 52,569; Japanese, 157,905; Korean, 6,851; Puerto Rican, 8,296.

r. 26. "Bill of Rights" by which 1923, Apr. 26. the territorial legislature defined and declared the claims of the territory concerning its status in the Union and provided for appointment of a commission to secure recognition of such claims by the federal government.

Maitland and Hegenberger 1927, June. flew from California to Hawaii, a feat that was repeated by many other fliers in the ensuing years.

1937. Samuel King, the Hawaiian delegate in the United States Congress, introduced a bill to change the status of the islands from that of territory to that of A congressional committee, however, reported against the project, the mixed character of the population and the strategic position of the islands making it appear inadvisable.

1937. Regular air connection was established with California with the introduction of the trans-Pacific line to Manila.

1939. The Hawaii Equal Rights Commission created by Act of the territorial legislature to further claims for equal treatment and to oppose federal legislation discriminatory to the territory.

1940. The electorate of Hawaii, in an unprecedented plebiscite, voted more than two to one in favor of statehood for Hawaii.

Over 1000 carrier planes raided Tokyo (July 10); the United States fleet moved in to shell Honshu and Hokkaido (July 14-15); the British fleet joined in carrier raids against Japanese centers (July 17); and American and British fliers sank some of the last remnants of the Japanese Navy in Tokyo Bay (July 19). On July 26 the United States, Great Britain, and China demanded that Japan surrender unconditionally, but the demand was ignored.
- July 20. Gen. Francisco Franco made changes in the Spanish cabinet, filled several government posts with men of reputedly royalist sympathies, and announced that the Spanish monarchy would be restored at a future date.

July 26. THE BRITISH LABOR PARTY WON 388 seats out of 640 in the national election of July 5; the ballots were counted three weeks later. A Labor Cabinet, with Clement R. Atlee as prime minister, replaced the coalition war cabinet of Winston Churchill which had held power since May 10, 1940.

Aug. 6-14. THE WAR IN THE PA-CIFIC ENDED in a week of disaster for Japan. An atomic bomb, the formula for which had been secretly perfected by United States and British scientists, and manufactured through an investment of $2,000,000,000, was dropped on the Japanese city of Hiroshima. It killed over 50,000 people, injured as many more, and leveled four square miles of homes and factories. Two days later, THE SOVIET UNION DECLARED WAR ON JAPAN and Russian armies swept into Manchuria (Aug. 8). On Aug. 9 a second atomic bomb shattered Nagasaki. The Japanese government offered to surrender if the Emperor Hirohito were permitted to retain his throne (Aug. 10), and on receiving this assurance THE JAPANESE ACCEPTED TERMS OF SURRENDER (AUG. 14).

Aug. 28-Sept. 2. UNITED STATES FORCES LANDED IN JAPAN to occupy strategic centers while the disarmament of Japanese military forces and the surrender of naval and air craft proceeded rapidly. FORMAL TERMS OF SURRENDER were signed by the Japanese envoys on board the U.S.S. Missouri in Tokyo Bay (Sept. 2) (p. 1170).

2. THE CAMPAIGNS IN POLAND AND FINLAND, 1939-1940

by German forces estimated at 1,700,000 men. Headed by mechanized divisions and supported by overwhelming air power, the German thrusts disorganized and defeated the poorly equipped Polish armies. Though the latter had a numerical strength of 600,000 men, they were unable to mobilize effectively or to concert their resistance. The rapidity of the German convergence, from East Prussia, Silesia, and Slovakia, alarmed the Soviet government.

Sept. 17. Russian troops therefore invaded Poland from the east, meeting the advancing Germans near Brest-Litovsk two days later.

Sept. 27. After heroic resistance and destructive bombing, Warsaw surrendered and Polish organized opposition came to an end. The Blitzkrieg had lasted less than four weeks and the outcome had been determined in the first ten days.

Sept. 29. The German and Russian governments divided Poland. Germany annexed outright the Free City of Danzig (population 415,000) and 32,000 square miles between East Prussia and Silesia. In addition an area of 39,000 square miles, known as the Gouvernement Général, remained under German protection. The total German gains were estimated at 72,866 square miles with a population of 22,140,000. The Russians occupied 77,620 square miles of Eastern Poland, with a population of 13,199,000.

Lithuania and Slovakia received small cessions of Polish territory.

Sept. 29. The Soviet government concluded a treaty with Estonia which gave Russia naval and air bases in Estonian territory.

Oct. 5. A similar pact with the Latvian government allowed the Russians to establish fortified bases in Latvia

Oct. 10. Russia and Lithuania concluded a mutual assistance pact. The Russians acquired the right to occupy stations of military importance in Lithuania and ceded Vilna and surrounding territory to Lithuania in return. The assistance pact was to run for 15 years.

Nov. 26. The Finnish government rejected Russian demands similar to those accepted by the lesser Baltic states. The Soviet government demanded the withdrawal of Finnish troops mobilizing on the frontier.

Nov. 30, 1939-Mar. 12, 1940. RUSSO-FINNISH WAR. Russian armies attacked Finland on three fronts: (1) below Petsamo on the Arctic Sea, in central Finland, and on the Karelian Isthmus.

Dec. 14. Russia was expelled from the League of Nations for acts of aggression against Finland.

1940, Mar. 12. After three months of varying success but increasing pressure, the Russians breached the Mannerheim Line. Finland accepted peace, negotiated at Moscow, ceding to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics the Karelian Isthmus, the city & Viipuri (Viborg), a naval base at Hangoe, and islands and territories totaling in all 16,173 square miles with a population of 450,000. Most of the Finns in the ceded areas were to be resettled in l'inland.

3. THE INVASION OF DENMARK AND NORWAY, - 1940

1940, Feb. 17. British naval forces entered Norwegian waters to rescue 326 prisoners of war from the German ship Allmark. The Norwegian government protested.

Apr. 8. The French and British governments announced that Norwegian waters had been mined to prevent the passage of German ships.

Apr. 9. German sea and air borne divisions descended on Norway.
Oslo, Bergen, Trondheim, Stavanger, and Narvik were rapidly invaded. At the same time German forces entered and occupied Denmark without formal resistance.

Apr. 11. Rallying from the surprise attack, Norwegian forces offered growing resistance. Four German cruisers and four troopships were lost in the invasion, and the German forces which had seized Trondheim and Bergen were driven out.

Apr. 13. British naval units attacked the Germans at Narvik, sinking all enemy ships in Narvik harbor and occupying the town until June 9.

Apr. 20. Anglo-French expeditionary forces landed in southern Norway, but were compelled to withdraw after two weeks (May 3).

Apr. 30. The Germans, reinforced steadily, captured Dombas, a key rail center, and Norwegian resistance was broken, though military operations were carried on until June 10. Haakon VII and his cabinet escaped to London to continue resistance.

Sept. 25. The German Reich-Commissar for Norway set aside the legal administration, dissolved all political parties except the Nasjonal Samling, and entrusted the government to thirteen commissars.

1942, Feb. 1. The German commissar, Joseph Terboven, appointed Vid-kun Quisling "minister president" of the German-dominated régime. Disowned by the Norwegian government in London, Quisling abolished the constitution and made himself dictator (Feb. 7).

4. THE CONQUEST OF THE NETHERLANDS AND BELGIUM AND THE FALL OF FRANCE

1940, May 10. German armies, without warning, invaded the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxemburg.
Winston S. Churchill replaced Neville Chamberlain as British prime minister.

May 11. The French and British governments dispatched expeditionary forces into Belgium to co-operate with the Belgian army in its resistance. The Germans captured Fort Eben Emael, key Belgian defense position.

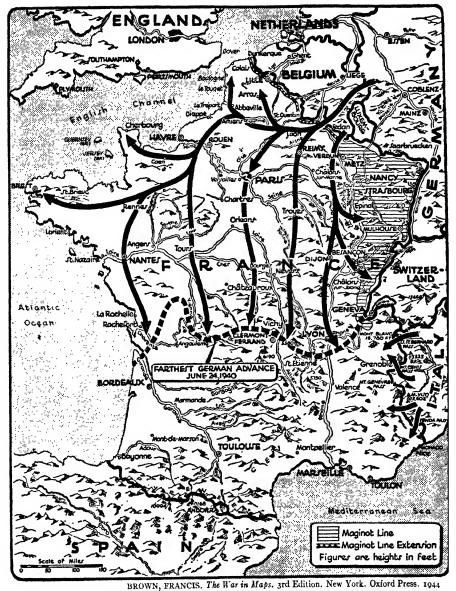

May 12. The Germans crossed the Meuse at Sedan.

May 13. Rotterdam surrendered to the Germans after part of the city had been blasted by an exterminating air attack. The Netherlands government, headed by Queen Wilhelmina, escaped to London. The Netherlands army capitulated May 14.

May 17-21. German mechanized divisions drove deep into northern France, racing down the Somme valley to the English Channel at Abbeville. The British and Belgian forces in Flanders were thus separated from the main French armies. Gen. Maxime Weygand replaced Gen. Gustave Gamelin as French commander-in-chief, but he was unable to arrest the French collapse. The fall of Brussels and Namur forced the British and Belgian armies back upon Ostend and Dunkerque.

May 26. Boulogne fell to the Germans. The Belgian armies, disorganized and short of supplies after eighteen days of fighting, could not sustain further attacks, and Leopold III ordered them to capitulate.

May 28. Exposed by the capitulation of the Belgians, the British expeditionary vorce of some 250,000 had to be withdrawn, chiefly from the beaches of Dunkerque.

June 4. By heroic efforts 215,000 British and 120,000 French troops were rescued, but were forced to abandon almost all equipment. British losses including prisoners totaled 30.000.

June 5. Having secured their right wing, the German invaders launched a wide attack against the French on an arc from Sedan to Abbeville.

June 10. ITALY DECLARED WAR AGAINST FRANCE AND GREAT BRITAIN. Italian forces invaded southern France.

June 13. Paris was evacuated before the continued German advance.

June 15. The French fortress of Verdun was captured. On the Baltic Russian forces moved into Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania (June 15-17).

June 16. Marshal Henri-Philippe Pétain replaced Paul Reynaud as head of the French government.

June 17. Pétain asked the Germans for an armistice.

June 22. The requested armistice was signed at Compiegne. It provided that the French forces were to be disarmed, and that three-fifths of France be surrendered to German control.

June 23. Gen. Charles de Gaulle, at the head of a French National Committee in London, pledged continued French opposition against Germany. The British government supported De Gaulle and severed relations with the régime of Marshal Pétain.

June 24. An armistice was concluded between France and Italy.

July 3. Battle of Oran. When the French crews refused to surrender, the British sank or captured a major section of the French fleet anchored at Oran, Algeria. The Dunkerque (26,000 tons), the Provence (22,000), the Brelagne (22,000), and an aircraft carrier (10,000) were destroyed.

July 4. All French ships in ports under British control were seized.

July 5. The French government at Vichy severed relations with the British government.

At Vichy, where the French government established its seat July 2, the parliament voted to give the Pétain régime the power to establish an authoritarian government. The vote was almost unanimous (395 to 3 in the Chamber of Deputies, 225 to 1 in the Senate). Pétain designated Pierre Laval as his vice-premier (July 12). On April 18, 1942, Laval became virtual dictator of France. On November 11, 1942, German forces entered Unoccupied France, following the Anglo-American invasion of North Africa. Pétain appointed Laval his successor and gave him authority to make laws and issue decrees. Laval thus became the puppet ruler of France under German direction. After the liberation of France a High Court of Justice declared Pétain guilty of plotting against the Republic and of intelligence with the enemy (Aug. 15, 1945). He was sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. (For the Liberation of France see p. 1163 f.)

5. THE BATTLE OF BRITAIN

1940, June. The Fail of France and the loss of war material in the evacuation from Dunkerque led the British prime minister, Winston Churchill, to appeal to the United States government for military supplies. These were released by the War Department (June 3), and three weeks later a first shipment including 500,000 rifles, 80,000 machine guns, 900 75 mm. field guns, and 130,000,000 rounds of ammunition reached Britain.

July. On the fall of France the Germans occupied islands in the English Channel and intensified their air attacks on British cities, communications, and shipping.

Aug. 8. German bombing planes opened an ambitious offensive designed to destroy British air strength by blasting the airfields and vital industries.

Aug. 15. One thousand German planes ranged as far north as Scotland. Croydon airfield was bombed. The British retaliated with heavy raids on Berlin, Duesseldorf, Essen, and other German cities.

Aug. 17. The German government proclaimed a total blockade of the waters around Great Britain.

Sept. 3. An important defense agreement was concluded between Great Britain and the United States. Fifty American destroyers were transferred to Britain to combat the air and submarine menace. In exchange the United States received a 99-year lease of naval and air bases in Newfoundland, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Antigua, St. Lucia, Trinidad, and British Guiana.

Sept. 7. Intensified bombing of London raised the casualties to 300-600 a day killed and 1000-3000 injured.

Sept. 11. The British bombed Continental ports, including Antwerp, Ostend, Calais, and Dunkerque, to frustrate German invasion preparations.

Sept. 16. Improved British defense measures inflicted heavy losses on German air raiders, 185 invading planes crashing in one day.

Sept. 27. A GERMAN-ITALIAN-JAP-ANESE PACT was concluded at Berlin providing for a ten-year military and economic alliance. The three contracting powers further promised each other mutual assistance in the event that any one of them became involved in war with a power not then a belligerent.

Oct. 10. Resuming the air assault with full intensity, the German Luftwaffe raided London heavily. Some Italian air squadrons joined in the attack. But shorter days, stormy weather, and improved defenses diminished the effectiveness of the air arm.

Nov. 10. In a supreme effort at crushing British industrial resources and demoralizing the population, the Germans blasted the industrial city of Coventry with destructive effect. Thereafter the air attacks became more sporadic. The British had survived the worst of the aerial Blitzkrieg and after November the winter weather made any attempt at invasion less likely. German losses in aircraft had been heavy: an official estimate placed them at 2375 German to 800 British planes destroyed in the period Aug. 8—Oct. 31. But many British cities had been severely shattered and burned, and 14,000 civilians had been killed in London alone. British losses at sea had also been heavy. On Nov. 5 Prime Minister Churchill declared that the submarine boat had become a greater menace than the bombing plane. (See Naval Warfare and Blockade, p. 1156 ff.)

Nov. 20. The Stimson-Layton Agreement, arranged between Sir Walter Layton, for the British Ministry of Supply, and Henry L. Stimson, United States Secretary of War, provided for a partial standardization of military weapons and equipment and initiated a general policy of pooling British and American technical knowledge, patents, and formulas in armament production.

Great Britain became increasingly 1941. dependent upon arms, food, and raw material from the United States throughout 1941 as the German sea and air blockade was extended. President Roosevelt had proposed (Nov. 1940) an equal division of the American arms output between the United States and Britain. British credit in dollar exchange, which had amounted to $6,500,000,000, was exhausted by January, 1941, however, and British purchases had to be curtailed. This situation was eased by the signing (Mar. 11, 1941) of the LEND-LEASE ACT. first shipments of food for Britain (Apr. 16) came just in time to avert a critical shortage there. Between April and December, 1941, one million tons of foodstuffs reached Britain from the United States.

May. Intensified German air attacks, facilitated by longer days and clearer skies, culminated in a shattering assault on London (May 10) which damaged the Houses of Parliament and the British Museum. Thereafter, however, secret German preparations for the invasion of Russia (June 22) reduced the number of bombers available for raids on Britain. Enormous damage had been endured by the British with remarkable courage. One home in every five was damaged or destroyed, factories shattered, and transport, gas, and water systems disrupted.

June 22. The Battle of Britain subsided with the opening of the Russian front in June, 1941. But the German submarine blockade remained a grave menace to British supply services throughout 1941 and 1942. It was gradually curbed by air and sea patrols, improved detection devices such as radar, and the extension of the convoy system. (See Naval Warfare and Blockade, p. 1156 ff.)

6. BALKAN CAMPAIGNS, 1940-1941

1940, June. The fall of France and the desperate position of Great Britain in the summer of 1940 caused a shift in the European balance. In the Balkans Rumania, which had won territory from all its neighbors in the twentieth century, was particularly menaced.

June 26. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics demanded the return of Bessarabia and the cession of north- ern Bukovina. The disputed territory, 19,300 square miles with a population of 3,500,000, was occupied by Russian troops June 28.

 - Aug. 30. Under pressure from Berlin and Rome, the Rumanian government agreed to yield an area of 16,642 square miles with a population of 2,392,603 to Hungary (Vienna Conference).
 - Sept. 5. These reverses caused a political overturn in Rumania. Gen. Ion Antonescu became premier.
 - Sept. 6. King Carol fled from Rumania and was replaced by his son as Michael V.
- Sept. 8. A further territorial cession of some 3000 square miles (Southern Dobruja) was demanded by, and yielded to, Bulgaria (Treaty of Craiova). These cessions cost Rumania in all about 40,000 square miles and 4,000,000 population.
- Oct. 4. Hitler and Mussolini conferred at the Brenner Pass. The failure to break British resistance and increasing activity in the Balkan and Mediterranean areas forecast a shift in Axis strategy. Hitler also conferred with the French vice-premier, Pierre Laval (Oct. 22), with Gen. Francisco Franco of Spain (Oct. 23), with Marshal Henri-Philippe Pétain, head of the Vichy French Government (Oct. 24), and again with Mussolini, in Florence (Oct. 28).
 - Oct. 8. German troops entered Rumania to "protect" the oil fields.
 - Oct. 28. Greece rejected a demand of the Italian government for the use of Greek bases. Thereupon the Italians invaded Greece from Albania.
 - Oct. 30. British reinforcements were landed on Crete and other Greek islands. The Russian government delivered 134 fighter planes to Greece in accord with existing agreements.
 - Nov. 12. Vyacheslav Molotov, Soviet commissar for foreign affairs, conferred with Hitler in Berlin. Russian troops were massed on the Rumanian border.
- Nov. 13. British bombing planes destroyed or damaged half of the Italian fleet anchored in the inner harbor at Taranto. At the same time Prime Minister Churchill announced the addition of five 35,000-ton battleships to the British navy.
 - Nov. 20. Hungary joined the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo Pact.

- Nov. 23. Rumania joined the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo Pact.
- Dec. 3. The Greeks broke through the Italian defenses in Albania, captured Porto Edda, and claimed a total of 28,000 prisoners. Agyrokastron was likewise captured five days later, and the Greeks overran one-fourth of Albania. The Germans dispatched 50,000 troops to reinforce the Italian armies. Combined with temporary successes of the British against the Italians in Africa, the Greek victories marked a blow to Axis prestige.
- 1941, Jan. 10. German air squadrons, transferred to Italy, attacked British naval forces off Sicily.
 - Feb. 10. The British government severed diplomatic relations with Rumania.
- Mar. 1. Bulgaria joined the Rome-Berlin Axis and German troops occupied Sofia. The British delegation had left Feb. 24, and the Russian government warned the Bulgarians not to expect Soviet aid.
 - Mar. 25. Yugoslav envoys signed the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Pact at Vienna.
- Mar. 26-28. A political coup at Belgrade overthrew the regency of Prince Paul, and Peter II was proclaimed king. A new cabinet under Gen. Simovich announced that Yugoslavia would follow a policy of neutrality.

In naval engagements between Sicily and Tripoli the British sank an Italian warship, two cruisers and two destroyers.

- Apr. 6. German troops, which had been massing on the German, Hungarian, Rumanian, and Bulgarian borders, poured into Yugoslavia and Greece. In Moscow official journals laid the responsibility for the spread of war upon the Germans.
 - Apr. 13. RUSSIAN AND JAPANESE DIPLOMATS SIGNED A MUTUAL NON-AGGRESSION PACT AT MOSCOW.
 - Apr. 17. The Yugoslav government capitulated after a campaign of 12 days. Resistance against the Germans and Italians was maintained by guerrilla forces.
 - Apr. 23. Greek resistance was broken and an armistice signed. King George II fled to Crete.
 - Apr. 27. The Germans entered Athens. Of the British expeditionary force in Greece 48,000 of the 60,000 men were evacuated, but much valuable equipment was abandoned.

May 2. In Iraq a pro-Axis régime under Premier Rashid Ali invited German aid, whereupon British forces entered the country.

May 20. German parachute troops invaded Crete and superior German air power inflicted serious losses and damage on the British cruisers and destroyers in Cretan waters.

May 31. Surviving British forces in Crete were evacuated to Cyprus and Egypt. The Axis position in the Eastern Mediterranean was greatly strengthened by the possession of Greece and Crete which made the Aegean Sea unsafe for British ships. Rebellion in Iraq ended when British troops entered Baghdad after Iraqi airfields had been bombed. Mosul was occupied June 4. An armistice was concluded and a government friendly to Great Britain installed. Iraq later declared war on Germany, Italy, and Japan (Jan. 16, 1943).

Confused fighting in Syria July 12. ended with an armistice after British and Free French forces moved on Beirut and Damascus. British naval units landed troops on the Lebanon coast. This occupation terminated the authority of the French Vichy government over Syria and Lebanon and cancelled the attempts of the Germans to obtain control of these territories. Possession of Syria and Iraq enabled the British to exert increased pressure upon Iran, the government of which was persuaded to co-operate (Aug. 28) after British and Russian forces entered the country. The danger that the German successes in the Balkans would bring Constantinople and the Straits under Axis control was fully realized in Moscow and the possibility that a Russian offensive might threaten the German flank explains in part why Hitler attacked Russia on June 22.

7. THE CAMPAIGNS IN RUSSIA, JUNE, 1941 — DECEMBER, 1944

1941, June 22. GERMAN ARMIES IN-VADED RUSSIA, opening hostilities on a front of 2000 miles, from the White to the Black Sea. The German invaders, with their allies, Italians, Rumanians, Hungarians, and Finns, were estimated at over 3.000,000 men. The Russians were credited with 2,000,000 men under arms, and an indefinite reserve. Prime Minister Churchill promised that Great Britain would extend all possible aid to the Russians.

June 29. The Germans reached Grodno, Brest-Litovsk, and Vilna.

July 1-2. Riga, capital of Latvia, was occupied by German troops, and the Russian retreat continued with heavy losses, especially around Bialystok.

July 13. A pact promising mutual aid was concluded between Great Britain and Russia.

July 16. The Germans captured Smolensk.

Aug. 1. Britain severed relations with Finland, which the Germans were using as a base for their invasion of Russia.

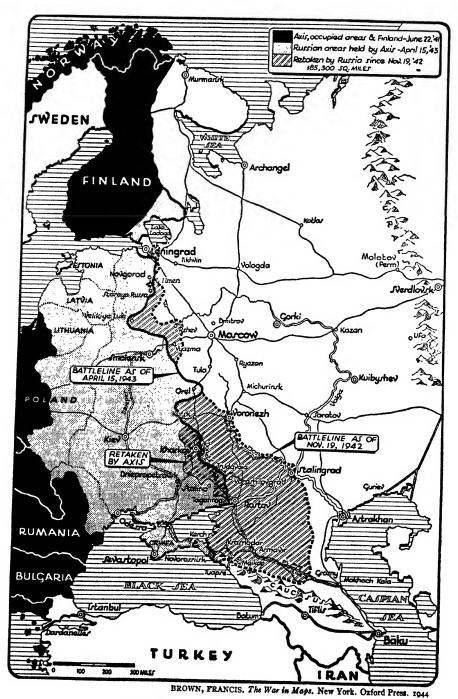

Aug. 19. The Germans claimed all Ukrainian territory west of the Dnieper except Odessa.

Aug. 25-29. British and Russian forces invaded Iran (Persia).

Sept. 4. The Germans commenced the beleaguerment of Leningrad, a state of partial siege which was not ended until Jan. 1943.

Sept. 19. Kiev and Poltava were stormed by the Axis forces, which continued their victorious advance to Orel (Oct. 8), Bryansk (Oct. 12), Vyasma (Oct. 13), Odessa (Oct. 16), Tanganrog (Oct. 19), and Kharkov (Oct. 24). By the end of October the Germans had entered the Crimea on the southern end of the vast front and had commenced the siege of Moscow in the north. The Soviet government transferred its headquarters to Kuibyshev.

THE FIRST RUSSIAN PRO-Oct. 1. TOCOL, signed at Moscow, provided that Great Britain and the United States would supply materials essential to the Russian war efforts for nine months. Purchase of American supplies was speeded by extending the Soviet government a credit of one billion dollars (Oct. 30). This was supplemented (June 11, 1942) by a Master Lend-Lease Agreement whereby the United States promised to supply the Soviet Union with such materials and services as the President might authorize. In return the Soviet government pledged that such articles or information would not be transferred to a third party without the consent of the President of the United

RETREAT IN RUSSIA, WORLD WAR II

States. The arrangement was to continue until a date agreed upon by the two governments and materials unconsumed were to be returned to the United States at the end of the emergency.

Nov. 15. The siege of Sevastopol, an heroic epic of the war on the eastern front, commenced.

Nov. 16. The Germans captured Kerch.
Rostov, entered by the invaders
(Nov. 22), was retaken by the Russians a week later (Dec. 1). A counter-thrust temporarily relieved the pressure on Moscow (Dec. 6) and the Russians were also able to retake Kalinin (Dec. 16).

1942, Jan. 20. Continuing their winter offensive the Russians recaptured Mozhaisk. Dorogobuzh also fell to them (Feb. 23) and Rzhev (Mar. 20). In addition they scored advances toward Kursk

(Apr. 29) and Kharkov (May 12).

May 26. The mutual aid pact between Great Britain and Russia was extended to a twenty-year treaty.

July 2. The Germans, who had opened a new summer offensive in southern Russia, captured Sevastopol which had sustained a siege of eight months. Driving powerfully toward the Caucasus, the Germans claimed Voronezh (July 7), Millerovo (July 15), and Rostov (July 24).

Aug. 9. Maikop fell to the invaders, who crossed the Don River (Aug. 20) and opened a vital offensive against Stalingrad (Aug. 22). This city was important as a communications center through which Volga River traffic, especially oil from the Caspian region, reached Russian distribution points. The Germans hoped not only to obtain needed supplies of petroleum for themselves, but to cripple the Russian war effort by cutting a major line of supply.

Sept. Russian agricultural supplies also were seriously reduced by the loss of the Ukraine and North Caucasus regions, for these areas had produced half the Soviet wheat and pork output. The grave deficiency was met in part after September, 1942, by increasing the shipments of canned meats, butter, fats, oils, dehydrated fruits and vegetables from the United States. By July, 1943, the Soviet Union had received 1,500,000 tons of foodstuffs under this arrangement.

Sept. 1. The Germans crossed the Kerch Straits and captured Novorossisk (Sept. 6). Farther north, a week later, they penetrated the city or Stalingrad (Sept. 14). Their summer offensive appeared on the point of succeeding, but they had overstretched their lines. Russian forces counter-attacked northeast of Stalingrad (Sept. 21) and ten days later (Oct. 1) opened a second thrust from southeast of the city.

Nov. 19. Without permitting the Germans time to entrench or to withdraw, the Russians intensified their pincer attack on the Stalingrad front while opening new drives toward Rzhev (Nov. 25) and Kharkov (Dec. 16).

1943, Jan. 1-18. The list of German defeats mounted to a débâcle. Russian forces recaptured Velikye-Luki (Jan. 1), entered Mozdok (Jan. 3), and relieved Leningrad from a 17-month siege. Twenty-two German divisions, cut off at Stalingrad, and reduced to 80,000 men, were forced to capitulate by Feb. 2. This second Russian winter offensive then rolled on, with the capture of Kursk (Feb. 8), Belgorod (Feb. 9), Rostov (Feb. 14), Kharkov (Feb. 16), Rzhev (Mar. 3), and Vyasma The losses of the Germans (Mar. 12). and their allies, in killed and captured, exceeded 500,000 for three months of winter fighting.

Mar. 15. Despite these casualties the Germans were able to open a spring drive, wresting Kharkov from the Russians once more (Mar. 15), and retaking Belgorod (Mar. 21). This checked the Russian tide of conquest temporarily and the lines were more or less stabilized. The Axis armies had been driven back halfway from the Don to the Dnieper. When they attempted to open a summer offensive in July, they found that the Russians had also been gathering men and material for a renewal of the struggle.

July. Military supplies from Great Britain and the United States helped materially to arm the Russian forces for the campaigns of 1943. The United States shipped 4100 planes, 138,000 motor vehicles, shiploads of steel, and industrial machinery for Soviet arms factories. Part of the equipment went by northern convoy routes to Archangel, part in Russian ships to Vladivostok, part via the Persian Gulf.
Shipments through Iran increased to 100, 000 tons a month by July, 1943.

July. The Russian summer campaign of 1943. The Germans and their allies had 240-260 divisions, the Soviet armies had grown to 250-275, and the advantage in matériel had passed to the Russians. Anglo-American bombing was crippling German industry, greatly reducing the output of German planes, and this unhinged the plane-tank combination of mechanized warfare which had won earlier successes for the Wehrmacht. The output of Russian factories had increased greatly, and the United States shipments of planes to Russia, mounting to a total of 6500 by the autumn of 1943, deprived the Germans of their superiority in the air.

July 5. The Germans opened an offensive in the Orel-Belgorod sector, but were checked after a week's fighting.

July 11. A Russian counter-drive forced the Germans from Orel and Belgorod (Aug. 5).

Aug. 23. Broadening and gathering momentum the Russian drive swept on to Kharkov. In the south, Tanganrog fell (Aug. 30), in the center, Bryansk was recaptured (Sept. 17) and Smolensk (Sept. 25). By October the Russians had reached the Dnieper at several points, capturing Kiev (Nov. 6). The year closed with the reconquest of Zhitomir (Dec. 31).

1944. In January Novgorod in the north fell to the Russians (Jan. 20) and by February they had penetrated Estonia and were on the borders of prewar Poland.

Feb. 17. Ten German divisions, trapped in a pocket near Cherkassy, were largely destroyed, and the survivors made prisoner.

Mar. 26. The Ukrainian drives carried the Russians to the Rumanian border. Odessa fell to them on Apr. 10 and Tarnopol on Apr. 15. By May 9 they had taken Sevastopol, and the Crimea, like the Ukraine, was cleared of invading forces.

June 20. An offensive against the Finns delivered Viborg into Russian hands. Farther south Vitebsk fell to them (June 26) and Minsk (July 3). The opening of an Allied front in the west, following the invasion of Normandy (June 6), prevented the Germans strengthening the eastern front, and July and August brought an almost unbroken series of Russian triumphs. By the end of August they had reached the borders of East Prussia and were invading Poland and Rumania.

Aug. 24. THE RUMANIAN GOVERN-MENT SURRENDERED when Russian troops reached the mouth of the Danube, and captured Jassy and Kishinev. The capitulation of Rumania trapped major units of the German Black Sea naval forces, although some of the smaller craft escaped up the Danube before the Russian advance closed that route of escape. Russian domination of the Black Sea opened a new and important supply route whereby cargoes could reach the Soviet Union.

Sept. 5. The Soviet Union declared war on Bulgaria. Three days later the Bulgarian government asked for an armistice (Sept. 8) and Russian columns moved into Sofia (Sept. 16).

Oct. 20. German forces of occupation in Yugoslavia were harassed increasingly by the Partisans and failed to halt the advance of the Russians who entered Belgrade (Oct. 20). Two weeks later they were at the gate of Budapest, but the Hungarian capital resisted savagely for over two months and was not conquered until Feb. 13, 1945.

Victorious in the Balkans, with their central armies pressing into Poland, and their northern (right) end of the line anchored on the Baltic after the capture of Tallinn (Sept. 22) and Riga (Oct. 13), the Russians opened their final drives into Germany (Jan., 1945). These maneuvers, synchronized with the Allied drives across the Rhine, merged into the Battle of Germany (p. 1164).

8. DEFENSE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

1939, Oct. 2. A Pan-American Conference at Panama declared that the waters surrounding the Western Hemisphere for a distance of 300 miles from shore and as far north as Canada constituted "sea safety zones" and must be kept free from hostile acts by non-American belligerent nations. The Conference also issued a General Declaration of Neutrality of the American Republics.

Nov. 4. President Roosevelt signed an amendment to the Neutrality Act which repealed the embargo on the sale of arms and placed exports to belligerent nations on a cash-and-carry basis.

Dec. 13. Three British cruisers attacked the German battleship Graf Spee and drove it into the harbor of Montevideo. When forced to leave harbor, it was scuttled by the German crew. In the name of the American republics the President of Panama protested to Great Britain, France, and Germany at this and other belligerent acts committed in American waters.

1940, May 16. President Roosevelt asked the Congress of the United States to appropriate $2,500,000,000 for expansion of the army and navy and proposed a productional goal of 50,000 airplanes a year. This program of expansion was to be supervised by a Defense Advisory Commission.

June 16. Congress authorized the sale of munitions to the government of any American republic. This measure, known as the Pittman Act, was extended by provisions authorizing the Export-Import-Bank to lend the American republics up to $500,000,000 (Sept. 26) and permitting them to procure munitions of a total value of $400,000,000 for their defense. These programs were taken over by the Lend-Lease Administration after its creation in March, 1941.

June 17. The United States Department of State notified European governments that it would not recognize the transfer of any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American Power.

July 20. President Roosevelt signed a bill providing for a two-ocean navy as part of a vast defense plan for the United States in particular and the Western Hemisphere in general.

July 30. The republics of the Pan-American Union approved a convention setting up an Inter-American Commission on Territorial Administration to guard the sovereignty of the states of the Western Hemisphere. At this meeting at Havana, the delegates also approved an Act of Havana providing that the American republics, jointly or individually, should act as their own defense and that of the continent required.

Aug. 18. President Roosevelt and Premier Mackenzie King of Canada agreed to set up a joint board of defense.

Sept. 2. The United States obtained naval and air bases in Newfoundland, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, St. Lucia, Trinidad, Antigua, and British Guiana on 99-year leases from Great Britain. In exchange Britain acquired 50 overage destroyers from the United States. The facilities at these bases were extended to the Latin American governments in conformity with understandings reached at the conferences of Lima, Panama, and Havana.

Sept. 16. The United States Congress passed the Selective Service Act providing for the registration of all men between 21 and 36 years of age, and for the training, for one year, of 1,200,000 troops and 800,000 reserves.

Dec. 20. The President of the United States named a defense board headed by William A. Knudsen to prepare defense measures and speed armament production.

1941, Feb. 1. The United States Patrol Force in the Caribbean area was raised to fleet status. Naval bases at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; San Juan, Puerto Rico; and St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, were developed rapidly. A third set of locks was designed for the Panama Canal.

Mar. 11. The Lend-Lease Act was signed by President Roosevelt. It had passed the Senate by a vote of 60 to 31 and the House of Representatives by 317 to 71. Under this enactment "any country whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States" became eligible to receive any defense article by sale, transfer, exchange, or lease.

Mar. The Republic of Panama granted the United States the right to extend its air defenses outside the limits of the Canal Zone. A Pan-American highway, to extend ultimately from Mexico City through Central America to Santiago, Chile, and thence across the Andes to Buenos Aires, and up the Atlantic coast to Rio de Janeiro, was two-thirds completed by December, 1941. A highway from Washington State to Alaska was also undertaken.

Apr. 9. The United States concluded an agreement with Denmark, undertaking to defend Greenland against invasion in return for the right to construct air and naval bases there.

July 7. United States forces landed in Iceland at the invitation of the Icelandic government, to relieve British troops in defending the island. Plans were completed (Sept. 25) for constructing air and naval base facilities in Iceland.

Nov. 24. The United States sent forces to occupy Dutch Guiana, to protect the resources and prevent possible activities by agents of the Axis powers.

Dec. 7. THE JAPANESE ATTACKED HAWAII AND THE PHILIP-PINES.

Dec. 8. THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES DECLARED WAR ON JAPAN.

1942, Jan. 15. Representatives of the American republics met for an Inter-American Conference at Rio de Janeiro. It was summoned to concert measures for defending the Western Hemisphere against aggression.

Jan. 21. The representatives of 21
American republics, assembled at Rio de Janeiro, adopted unanimously a resolution calling for severance of relations with the Axis powers.

Mar. An Inter-American Defense Board was established to promote working co-operation among the American states in defense of the Western Hemisphere.

June 28. Eight German agents who had landed from a submarine on the shore of Long Island were captured by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Sept. Ecuador granted the United States naval bases in the Galápagos Islands and the Santa Elena peninsula.

1943, Jan. 29. President Roosevelt visited President Getulio Vargas. They announced the joint determination of the governments of the United States and Brazil to safeguard the sea lanes of the Atlantic Ocean.

Mar. 11. The Lend-Lease Act was extended for one year by a vote of 82 to 0 in the Senate and 407 to 6 in the House of Representatives.

Apr. 21. President Roosevelt visited President Avila Camacho. They emphasized the good relations existing between the United States and Mexico as an example of the Good Neighbor policy.

Oct. 13. The government of Portugal conceded to Great Britain the right to use bases in the Azores Islands for air and naval patrol. This privilege was shared by United States ships and planes.

1944, Sept. 29. President Roosevelt called attention to the "growth of Nazi-Fascist influence" in Argentina and the failure of the Argentine government to fulfill its inter-American obligations. United States ships were forbidden to call at Argentine ports.

The Mexican government agreed to pay $24,000,000 with interest at 3 per cent for the property of United States oil companies expropriated in 1038.

1945, Feb. 21-Mar. 8. Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace met in Mexico City. The United States offered an "economic charter for the Americas," to promote orderly reconversion and raise the standards of living.
In addition, the United States government guaranteed for the duration of the war to aid any American state if its political independence or territorial integrity were attacked by a neighbor.

Mar. 3. The "Act of Chaputepec" was approved by the delegates of 19 American republics, providing for joint action to guarantee each American state against aggression. The states of the Western Hemisphere were to act collectively in their own defense unless and until the World Security Council should take effective measures to deal with an attack.

Mar. 27. The Argentine Republic declared war on Germany and Japan. One week later (Apr. 4) the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union admitted Argentina to membership and the Argentine régime was recognized (Apr. 9) by the United States, Great Britain, and France.

9. NAVAL WARFARE AND BLOCKADE

The gross tonnage of the merchant fleets of the leading nations in 1939 reflects the overwhelming advantage which Great Britain and her subsequent allies enjoyed on the sea. The ships of Norway, Holland, and Belgium, most of which escaped when these countries were overrun by the Germans in 1940, took service with the British and helped to build up the pool of United Nations shipping.

Merchant tonnage, 1939.

Great Britain 21,001,025 Japan Germany 5,629,845 United States 11,470,177 4,482,662 Norway Italy 3,424,804 Netherlands 2,969,578 2,933,933 France Belgium 408,418 Total 13,537,311 43,617,844

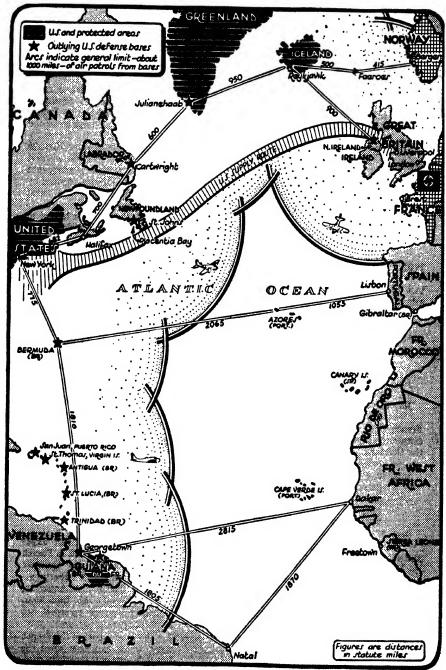

In 1939 the world tonnage for merchant ships of 100 tons or over was 68,509,432. More than half of this was destroyed, largely by submarine or air attack, in the course of the next five years. Yet so energetic was the shipbuilding program, carried out largely in American yards immune to air attack, that by May, 1945, Britain and the United States, through the War Shipping Administration, disposed of over 4000 ships with a deadweight tonnage of 43,000,000. The Germans, Italians, and Japanese, on the other hand, found it increasingly difficult to make good their losses, and by 1945 their fleets, merchant and naval, had been almost completely eliminated.

1939, Sept. 3. The British government proclaimed a naval blockade of Germany.

Nov. 21. The British tightened the blockade on German imports and announced that German exports likewise would be halted.

Dec. 1. From this date neutral shippers were advised to obtain a "navicert"?

BROWN, FRANCIS. The War in Maps. New York. Oxford Press. 1944

or certificate from British consular officials. These navicerts enabled a cargo to be passed through the patrols established by the British government in concert with its allies. Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Japan protested against the British blockade measures.

Dec. 8. The United States Department of State questioned the British practice of seizing German goods on neutral vessels, and challenged (Dec. 14) the diversion of United States ships to British and French control bases. The State Department also protested (Dec. 27) against the British examination of neutral mail in the search for contraband. Dec. 13. The German battleship Graf Spee, damaged by British cruisers in the South Atlantic, sought refuge at Montevideo. When forced to depart, it was blown up by order of the commander (Dec. 17).

1940, Feb. 16. A British destroyer invaded Norwegian coastal waters to attack the German ship Allmark, which was attempting to reach Germany with British prisoners of war aboard. The Norwegian government protested to London.

Apr. 8. The British and French governments announced that Norwegian waters had been mined to prevent the transit of German ships.

June 25. Japanese warships arrived at ports in French Indo-China.

July 3. BATTLE OF ORAN. British naval forces destroyed part of the French fleet stationed at Oran to make certain the ships would not be available for the Germans. The French officers had refused to surrender.

July 20. The United States Congress passed a bill calling for an unparalleled expansion of naval tonnage and the creation of a "two-ocean" navy.

Sept. 3. The United States acquired the use, on a 99-year lease, of naval and air bases in Newfoundland, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Antigua, St. Lucia, Trinidad, and British Guiana. In exchange, fifty overage destroyers were transferred to Great Britain.

Sept. 6. The United States Congress passed a defense measure appropriating $5,246,000,000 and providing for 201 ships of war, seven to be battleships of 55,000 tons each.

Sept. 22-25. British naval forces aided a "Free French" expedition, under Gen. Charles de Gaulle, in an attempt to take possession of Dakar in French West Africa. The forces holding Dakar for the Vichy government of France resisted and the attack was abandoned.

1941, Mar. 30. Battle of Cape Matapan.
Three Italian cruisers and two destroyers were sunk by British naval forces in the waters between Crete and Greece.

Apr. 10. The United States declared Greenland under its protection and arranged with the Danish government to establish naval and air bases there.

an Dases there.

May 24. The giant battleship Bismarck escaped into the Atlantic, where it sank the British dreadnought Hood, but was itself destroyed by combined British air and naval attack (May 27).

July 7. United States troops landed in Iceland to relieve British occupying forces, provide for the defense of the island, and develop air and naval bases.

navai bases

July 31. Official London estimates of British, Allied, and neutral shipping losses for almost two years of war placed them at more than 7,000,000 tons.

Sept. 16. The United States navy assumed protection of all shipments as far as Iceland.

Oct. 17. The United States destroyer Kearny was torpedoed off Iceland, but reached port. The destroyer Reuben James, likewise torpedoed in the Atlantic, was lost (Oct. 31).

Dec. 7. THE JAPANESE OPENED A SURPRISE ATTACK ON HA-WAII, THE PHILIPPINES, MA-LAYA, AND HONGKONG. (For developments in the Pacific area see p. 1107.)

1942, Apr. 18. Sixteen bombing planes from the United States carrier Hornet, led by Col. James Doolittle, bombed Tokyo.

Nov. 8. American and British Expeditionary Forces landed in French North Africa in the greatest amphibious invasion hitherto attempted. The British, American, and Allied warships, transports, and cargo vessels exceeded 850 ships (p. 1160).

Nov. 27. The greater part of the French navy, which had been rated the fourth largest in the world in 1939, was scuttled by the crews in Toulon harbor to prevent the Germans obtaining the ships.

1943, Mar. 17. The United States, Britain, and Canada issued official assurances that their governments were in agreement on the most effective methods for combating the U-boat menace.

July 10. American, British, and Canadian forces invaded Sicily in the second mass amphibious invasion of the Over 2500 vessels were involved. The conquest of all North African territory had given the Allied powers control of the Mediterranean routes and increased their advantages for transport and block-

July 16. President Roosevelt issued an order creating a new Board of Economic Warfare.

Aug. 24. At the Quebec Conference which ended on this date, Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt announced important progress in curbing German submarine activity. "In the first six months of 1943 the number of ships sunk by U-boats was only half that of the last six months in 1942 and one-quarter that of the first six months of 1942." Figures subsequently released by the Office of War Information (Nov. 29, 1944) revealed that the tonnage of Allied and neutral merchant ships lost through enemy action between Sept., 1939, and Jan. 1, 1944, aggregated 22,101,000 gross tons. This was replaced by the output of United States shipyards alone, which launched 4308 ships with a deadweight tonnage of 44,082,000 in the same period.

Aug. 29. When the Germans attempted to seize the Danish naval vessels anchored in the navy yard at Copenhagen, the crews scuttled 29 of the 48 ships. Some of the smaller craft, 13 in all, escaped to Sweden, and 6 fell into German hands.

Sept. 3. With air and naval support ALLIED FORCES CROSSED THE STRAITS OF MESSINA AND LANDED IN SOUTHERN ITALY. This marked the first successful amphibious invasion of continental Europe in the course of the war.

Sept. 12. The major part of the Italian fleet escaped to the Allies after the Italian government of Marshal Pietro Badoglio surrendered.

Oct. 13. Portugal granted Great Britain the use of the Azores Islands as an Allied naval and air base.

1944. By 1944 the United Nations had achieved a position of naval supremacy which increased monthly and could no longer be seriously challenged. Despite improvements in submarine construction, 500 U-boats had been destroyed and merchant-ship losses from this cause sharply reduced. The Germans no longer had any capital ships in fighting condition and had all but ceased to build or repair shipping. What warships survived of the Italian and French navies were wrecked or in Allied control, part of the French fleet having been repaired at a cost of $200,-000,000. The Japanese still possessed a respectable navy, including 17 capital ships, but it was inadequate to protect the long route to the East Indies and Malaya, threatened increasingly by American and British aircraft and submarines. Japanese air power in particular was seriously reduced, and less than ten Japanese carriers survived, a fatal deficiency when the British carrier list had risen to 40 and the United States navy possessed over 100. Inability to maintain air protection for warships even in harbor was to doom the remnants of the Japanese navy in 1945.

1944, Jan. 23. The Allies landed forces on the Italian coast south of Rome in a second amphibious invasion of the Italian mainland (p. 1162).

ALLIED FORCES LANDED June 6. AT SEVERAL POINTS ON THE CHERBOURG PENINSULA, with strong naval support, an armada of 4000 ships, and over 10,000 aircraft (p. 1163). For naval activities in the Pacific areas see The War in the Pacific (p. 1167 ff.).

10. CAMPAIGNS IN AFRICA, 1940-1943

1940, June 10. ITALY DECLARED WAR FRANCE AND GREAT ON BRITAIN.

Italian forces invaded British Aug. 6. Somaliland from Italian East Africa, completing their conquest by Aug. 19.

Sept. 13-15. An Italian army invaded Egypt from Libya.

Sept. 23. British naval forces and Free

French troops under Gen. Charles de Gaulle attempted to occupy Dakar in French East Africa, but were re-The attempt was abandoned pulsed. Sept. 25.

Oct. 9. Free French forces under Gen. de Gaulle took possession of Duala on the Kamerun Coast, West Africa.

Dec. 8. The British opened a surprise drive against the Italians in North Africa. From Mersa Matruh in Egypt, to which they had retreated, Imperial troops outflanked the Italians, captured 1000 prisoners, and advanced so rapidly that they were in Sidi Barrani and had invaded Libya by Dec. 12.

The Italian garrison at 1941, Jan. 5. Bardia surrendered to the Imperial forces, which took 25,000 prisoners and valuable war material.

Jan. 15. British forces from the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan and Kenya opened drives into Italian East Africa (Ethiopia) and also penetrated Eritrea (Jan. 19).

Jan. 22. Tobruk fell to the Imperial forces invading Libya. Derna surrendered (Jan. 24), Benghasi, capital of Cyrenaica, was entered (Feb. 7), and advance units reached El Argheila (Feb. 8). In a campaign of two months the Imperial divisions, commanded by General Sir Archibald Wavell, had captured over 114,000 prisoners at a cost of 3000 casualties.

Feb. 26. Mogadiscio, capital of Italian Somaliland, fell to the Imperial forces.

Mar. 22. Neguelli in southern Ethiopia was occupied by the British and Ethiopian forces, and the capital, Addis Ababa, capitulated (Apr. 6). Italian resistance in Eritrea collapsed by June, and before the end of 1941 all Italian East Africa was under British control.

Apr. 3. The Italians, reinforced by German divisions trained for desert fighting, and brilliantly commanded by Gen. Erwin Rommel, opened an attack against the Imperial outposts in Libya. Weakened by the dispatch of 60,000 troops to Greece, the British were forced to abandon their recent conquests in a costly retreat.

The Germans reoccupied 14. Apr. Sollum and Bardia.

Apr. 20. Tobruk was encircled, but the Imperial garrison held out with naval support. The drive of the Axis mechanized divisions stopped at the Egyptian frontier (May 29). Through the summer the British prepared for a counteroffensive.

Second British drive into Dec. 11. Libya. After relieving Tobruk, Imperial troops reached Benghasi for the second time (Dec. 25), but stopped short of El Argheila (Jan. 18, 1942). Gen. Rommel's reserves in Africa had been depleted because of the opening of the German drive on Russia (p. 1151).

1942, May 27. Second Axis drive on Egypt. Reinforced, Rommel opened a powerful drive which captured Tobruk once more (June 21) and swept on to Bardia and Bir-el-Gobi. The victorious advance of the Axis troops was finally checked at El Alamein, only 70 miles from Alexandria. A four months' lull followed.

Oct. 23. Third British offensive in North Africa. The British Eighth Army under Gen. Bernard L. Montgomery drove east from El Alamein and expelled Rommel's divisions from Egypt by Nov. 12.

Nov. INVASION OF FRENCH NORTH AFRICA. An Anglo-American invasion force, commanded by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, disembarked in French Morocco and Algiers. This amphibious operation, on a scale hitherto unequaled in history, required 850 ships. The French garrisons at Casablanca, Oran, and Algiers were overcome after brief fighting, and an armistice arranged (Nov. 11) by Admiral Jean-François Darlan, who was in Algiers. Darlan, whose rôle as representative of the Vichy government was decidedly ambiguous, aided the Anglo-American forces to assume control of French North Africa and West Africa, but he was assassinated on Dec. 24.

Nov. 11. The Germans entered and took over control of Unoccupied France.

Nov. 27. The greater part of the French fleet which still survived was scuttled by the crews in Toulon harbor to frustrate the attempt of the Germans to obtain possession of the ships.

Admiral Darlan retained his Dec. 1. post as Chief of State in North Africa with Anglo-American approval. On his assassination (Dec. 24), Gen. Henri Giraud was designated to succeed him.

n. 24. Tripoli was occupied by the British Eighth Army which 1943, Jan. 24. pursued the retreating Axis forces into Tunisia.

Jan. 17-27. Conference at Casablanca, Morocco, with President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Prime Minister Winston Churchill, Gen. Henri Giraud, and Gen. Charles de Gaulle attending. The relationship between Giraud and the De Gaulle "Fighting French" party remained undefined, and Gen. Eisenhower took command of the unified North African operations. Plans for reducing the Axis powers to "unconditional surrender" were discussed at Casablanca but not disclosed.

Feb. 22. The Germans, who had rushed reinforcements to Tunisia, sought to hold this Protectorate, and seized Kasserine Pass. The Americans reoccupied it four days later.

BROWN, FRANCIS. The War in Maps. New York. Oxford Press. 1944

Mar. 15. Gen. Giraud at Algiers restored representative government in French North Africa, declared legislation introduced there since 1040 void, and promised that after victory the French nation would decide its own form of govern-

Mar. 19. American forces, striking east from Algeria, captured El Guettar in Tunisia.

Mar. 30. The British Eighth Army broke through the Mareth Line into southern Tunisia, meeting the advancing American Second Army Corps between Gabes and El Guettar on Apr. 8.

May 8-12. End of the Axis resistance in North Africa. British and United States forces captured the cities of Tunis and Bizerte. Possession of the whole North African coast opened the central Mediterranean to Allied shipping and exposed Italy to invasion. The threat to Egypt and the Suez Canal was ended and the Italian dream of a great African empire had proved a costly failure. Fighting in Africa was estimated to have drained the Axis powers of 950,000 men, killed or captured, 8000 airplanes, and 2,400,000 tons of shipping.

THE INVASION OF ITALY 11.

1943, July 10. United States, British, and Canadian forces invaded Sicily under the command of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. Over 2000 vessels were employed to convoy 160,000 men, and landings were effected along the southern coast. The Americans seized Gela; the British Eighth Army and Canadian troops, disembarking at Cape Passaro, drove along the east shore.

July 14. Port Augusta was captured.
July 19. Allied bombing planes wrecked Naples, and, after repeated warnings, attacked railway terminals and military objectives in Rome (July 20).

July 22. Half of Sicily was occupied, the Allied front stretching from Catania to Mazzara. Palermo fell July 24.

July 25. BENITO MUSSOLINI WAS FORCED TO RESIGN with his cabinet and his place was taken by Marshal Pietro Badoglio. This coup was virtually a revolution, breaking the 21-year period ! of Fascist rule. Badoglio declared the Fascist Party dissolved (July 28) and opened negotiations for an armistice.

Aug. 18. Resistance in Sicily collapsed with the fall of Messina. The campaign had cost the Allied armies an estimated 22,000 casualties, the Axis forces 167,000. At a loss of 274 planes the Allied airmen accounted for 1601 enemy aircraft.

Sept. 2. British and American forces crossed the Straits of Messina and landed in southern Italy.

Sept. 3. An armistice was signed at Algiers, ending hostilities between the Anglo-American forces and those of the Badoglio régime. It was announced (Sept. 8) that the Italian surrender was unconditional. The actual terms were not disclosed.

Sept. 15. Ex-Premier Mussolini, who had been held a prisoner near Rome, was rescued by German troops (Sept. 12) and proclaimed the establishment of a Republican Fascist Party (Sept. 15) in alliance with the German army of occupation. The Italian people were confused and divided, and the German divisions in the country seized the leading cities including Rome.

After landing near Salerno Oct. 1. (Sept. 9) American troops entered Naples. Thereafter, however, winter weather, the mountainous countryside, and stubborn German resistance stopped the Allied advance on a line south of Cassino.

1944, Jan. 22. Allied forces landed at Anzio in an attempt to outflank the German lines. The beachhead proved costly to hold and changed the situation little.

Feb. 11. Part of southern Italy, with Sicily and Sardinia, were returned to the jurisdiction of the Italian govern-After occupation these areas had been administered with the aid of an Allied Control Commission, and Allied Military Government (A.M.G.), and an Advisory Council for Italy composed of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and the French Com-mittee of National Liberation.

Mar. 15. The Allied armies launched a heavy assault against Cassino, which fell May 18.

June 4. The Anglo-American troops entered Rome.

LIBERATION OF FRANCE AND BELGIUM, 1944 A.D. 1163

Aug. 12. Florence was captured after bitter fighting and Italy controlled by the Allies up to a line running from Livorno to Ancona. Thenceforth the Italian front remained a tense but unprogressive field of action until the final collapse of Germany in April and May, 1945.

The German divisions in Italy were forced to capitulate (Apr. 20-May 1), and the Fascist Republican Party dissolved. Mussolini was seized when he attempted to escape to Switzerland and was shot by his anti-Fascist captors without formal trial (Apr. 20).

12. THE LIBERATION OF FRANCE AND BELGIUM

1944, June 6. INVASION OF NOR-For many months MANDY. careful and elaborate plans had been matured by the Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Forces (SHAEF) for invading France. Command of this greatest amphibious operation in history was entrusted to Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. The British Isles provided the chief base for the concentration of men and war material, and the plan of campaign to follow the invasion date (D-Day) was rehearsed in exhaustive detail. Air control was to be maintained by the United States 8th and 9th Air Forces, and the British Royal Air Force, with a combined strength of over 10,000 planes. An American Naval Task Force and a British Naval Task Force were assembled to support the assault, and the invasion was planned to proceed under cover of an intense and accurately directed bombardment by 800 guns on 80 warships. To convey the troops and supplies across the Channel, 4000 other ships were utilized, and the lack of port facilities for disembarkation was overcome by a dramatic improvisation in engineering. Artificial harbors were to be constructed on an exposed coast by sinking lines of blockships and concrete caissons to form breakwaters, with floating pierheads and pontoon causeways to serve as wharves and docks.

June 6. United States and British forces succeeded in landing on the Normandy coast between St. Marcouf and the Orne River. Within a week a strip of beach 60 miles long had been occupied and the artificial harbors constructed.

June 18. An unusually severe gale with high waves delayed landing operations for three days and wrecked the major causeways in one artificial harbor. It was abandoned and traffic diverted to a Britishbuilt harbor which was less exposed and had suffered less severely.

June 27. The capture of Cherbourg placed a major port in Allied control. During the first hundred days following D-Day 2,200,000 men, 450,000 vehicles, and 4,000,000 tons of stores were landed.

This extraordinary achievement was rendered possible by perfecting the services of supply, on the basis of experience gained in the First World War, and in the amphibious landings in Africa and Italy. The enormous output of Allied factories and shipyards, which made it possible to duplicate all wrecked or damaged equipment, was also an important factor.

July 9. British and Canadian troops captured Caen. Allied tanks broke through German defenses near St. Lo and fanned out, disorganizing enemy resistance. Persistent bombing of all bridges and railways severely crippled the German attempts to bring up adequate forces to halt the Allied drives.

Aug. 15. In another amphibious operation the Allies effected successful landings on the French Mediterranean coast between Marseille and Nice.

Aug. 24. The citizens of Paris rioted against German forces of occupation as Allied armed divisions crossed the Seine and approached the capital. French Forces of the Interior (FFI), which had been organized for underground resistance and supplied with arms, rose against the retreating Germans.

Sept. 2. Allied forces, which had penetrated into Belgium, liberated Brussels.

Sept. 12. The American First Army crossed the German frontier near Eupen, and American armored forces entered Germany north of Trier. The Germans, however, manning their Westwall defenses, offered firm resistance and the Allied advance was halted. An Allied attempt to outflank the Westwall through the flat Dutch territory to the north (Sept. 17-26) failed, and survivors of an Allied airborne division which was dropped in Holland to Arnhem had to be withdrawn.

Sept. 15. The American Seventh and the French First Armies, sweeping up the Rhone Valley from beachheads won (Aug. 15) on the Riviera coast, joined the American Third Army at Dijon. The American, British, and French forces were then reorganized in liberated France for a projected assault on Germany.

Dec. 16-25. BATTLE OF THE BULGE.

The German supreme commander in the west, Gen. Karl von Rundstedt, under orders from Adolf Hitler, dislocated Allied preparations by a sudden drive against thinly held American lines in the Belgian and Luxemburg sector. Suffering heavy losses, the Allied forces were driven back to the Meuse, but they rallied to attack strongly on both sides of the "bulge" and the Germans were checked before the close of December.

With the opening of 1945, the American, British, and French drives into Germany from the west, co-ordinated with the rapid and powerful Russian thrusts from the Danube Valley, Poland, and East Prussia, fused into one vast combined operation.

13. THE BATTLE OF GERMANY, 1945

THE RÔLE OF AIR POWER. In twentieth-century warfare the assembly line has become as important as the battle line and consequently an equally vital target for attack. The strategy of blockade adopted by the Allied governments was designed primarily to starve, not the German population, but German industrial and military machines, chiefly by cutting off fuel and essential raw material. This aim could best be achieved by supplementing the naval blockade with a systematic bombing of German factories, power plants, and transportation centers.

At the commencement of the Second World War, in 1939, the Germans possessed the strongest air force in the world. By the close of 1943, however, their bombing squadrons were depleted, though they still had a peak force of 3000 first-line fighters. In 1944 the Allied air offensive was sharply intensified and German air strength declined decisively. Over 1000 Luftwaffe planes were destroyed in January and February and vital machine plants in Essen and Schweinfurt were crippled. Henry H. Arnold, commanding general of the United States Army Air Forces, later characterized the week of Feb. 20-26, 1944, as "probably the most decisive of the war" because of the shattering damage inflicted upon German installations in six days of favorable flying weather. By the end of hostilities the Germans had received 315 tons of explosive in retaliation for every ton of aerial bombs they had launched against Britain. Their loss in planes, by Jan. 1, 1945, had passed 50,000, in comparison with a total loss of 17,790 suffered by the United States Air Forces on all fronts. During the last four months of fighting, Allied air squadrons roamed Germany almost at will, destroying communications, obliterating plants and stores, and wrecking many of the remaining German aircraft on the ground, where they lay helpless for lack of fuel and repairs.

1945. The military collapse of Germany was consummated in four months by simultaneous drives launched by Russian armies in the east and south and American, French, and British Imperial forces in the west.

Jan. 12. Opening a powerful drive into Poland, the Russians took Warsaw (Jan. 17), swept into Tarnow, Cracow, and Lodz two days later (Jan. 19), and forced the Germans to abandon the whole Vistula defense line. By Feb. 20, Russian mechanized units, spearheads of an encroaching Soviet host that numbered 215 divisions, were within 30 miles of Berlin.

Feb. 7. Yalta Conference. While President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, and Marshal Stalin met at Yalta in the Crimea, to plan the final defeat and occupation of Germany (p. 1143), the United States Third Army crossed the German frontier at ten points. British and Canadian divisions opened an offensive southeast of Nijmegen (Feb. 8).

Feb. 22. The Third Army continued its progress, crossing the Saar River. American advance forces drove into the Ruhr Valley (Feb. 23) and entered Trier (Mar. 2) and Cologne (Mar. 5). Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Forces announced that the total of German prisoners taken since D-Day (June 6, 1944) amounted to 054,377.

Mar. 8. The United States First Army crossed the Rhine at Remagen, and the German defense system on the east bank collapsed. By Apr. 12 the United States Ninth Army had reached the Elbe River; eight days later the Russians fought their way into Berlin (Apr. 20); and advance units of the American and Russian armies met on the Elbe at Torgau (Apr. 26).

Apr. 29. German resistance in northern Italy broke as American and British forces swept into the Po Valley.
The Fascist Republican régime disintegrated, and Benito Mussolini, attempting to escape to Switzerland, was captured and shot by Italian Anti-Fascist partisans. The German divisions in Italy surrendered unconditionally.

May 1. BATTLE OF BERLIN. Russian forces continued to shell Berlin and fight their way into the capital. A German radio announcement from Hamburg declared that Adolf Hitler had died defending the Reichschancellery, and that Admiral Doenitz had succeeded him.

One million German and Italian soldiers in Italy and Austria laid down their arms.

May 4. The dissolution of the German National Socialist régime continued, with local military commanders making their own offers of capitulation. German divisions in northwestern Germany, the Netherlands, and Denmark surrendered.

May 7. A group of German army leaders sent envoys to Reims, where they signed terms of surrender.

May 8. President Truman for the United States and Prime Minister Churchill for Great Britain proclaimed the end of the war in Europe (V-E Day).

May 9. Marshal Stalin announced the end of the war to the Russian people. German army chiefs completed the formula of surrender in Berlin.

May 9-23. While German armed forces were being disarmed, the Allied governments transmitted orders through a provisional German government headed by Admiral Karl Doenitz. After two weeks this provisional régime was superseded. Doenitz, with several colleagues, and members of the German High Command and the General Staff, were taken into custody.

June 5. An Allied Control Committee, including Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, Field Marshal Sir Bernard L. Montgomery, and Marshal Gregory K. Zhukov, assumed full control throughout Germany. German territory, as of Dec. 31, 1937, was delimited in four zones of occupation under American, British, Russian, and French military administration.

14. THE WAR IN ASIA

1939. Economic penetration and military intervention enabled the Japanese to bring a widening area of China under their control after 1931, and especially after 1937. By the capture of Hankow in 1939, they forced the Chinese Nationalists to establish a new capital at Chungking (p. 1122). At the same time, the outbreak of war in Europe compelled the British, French, and Russian governments to concentrate their forces in that quarter, and left the United States the only Great Power in a position to oppose Japanese expansion.

Dec. 31. Russia and Japan reached an accord concerning the renewal of fishing rights and the settlement of debt claims between Russia and Manchukuo.

1940, Jan. 14. Admiral Mitsumasa Yonai formed a new Japanese cabinet.

Jan. 26. The Trade Treaty between the United States and Japan, first negotiated in 1911, expired. The State Department informed the Japanese government that commercial arrangements would continue on a day-to-day basis.

Mar. 30. The Japanese supported the establishment of a puppet government under Wang Ching-wei at Nanking to administer the areas of China under their control.

Apr. 17. Secretary of State Cordell Hull warned the Japanese that the United States would oppose any attempt to change the status quo of the Netherlands East Indies by other than peaceful means.

June 9. Russia and Japan reached an accord regarding the disputed frontier of Manchukuo.

June 25. With the collapse of France under the German invasion, the Japanese demanded the right to land forces in French Indo-China. Japanese warships arrived at several ports there.

July 16. Prince Fumumaro Konoye became Japanese premier with a mandate to organize the government on totalitarian lines.

July 18. The British government closed the Burma Road. This was the main route by which the Chinese Nationalist armies under Gen. Chiang K'ai-shek could obtain foreign war material. The Japanese agreed to discuss peace terms with the Chinese Nationalist government.

Aug. 9. British garrisons at Shanghai and in northern China were withdrawn.

Sept. 4. Secretary of State Hull warned the Japanese government that aggressive moves against Indo-China would have an unfortunate effect upon public opinion in the United States.

Sept. 26. After the French government at Vichy had conceded the use of three airfields and several ports in Indo-China, Japanese forces began the occupation of Indo-China and crossed into China 120 miles from Hanoi. The United States government placed an embargo on the export of iron and steel scrap after Oct. 15 to countries (except Great Britain) outside the Western Hemisphere. The Japanese ambassador at Washington described this (Oct. 8) as an "unfriendly act."

Sept. 27. JAPAN JOINED ITALY AND GERMANY in a ten-year tripartite pact "for the creation of conditions which would promote the prosperity of their peoples." The pact also contained mutual pledges of total aid in the event any of the partners became engaged in war with a country not yet a belligerent

Oct. 18. Great Britain reopened the Burma Road.

1941, Jan. 31. Under Japanese auspices an armistice was arranged to end hostilities which had broken out between Thailand and French Indo-China. The Japanese obtained rice, rubber, coal and minerals from Indo-China, and confirmed their military occupation.

Mar. 11. France and Thailand concluded a convention, later signed at Tokyo (May 9) whereby Thailand acquired the section of Laos Province west of the Mekong River, three-fourths of the Campong-Thom Province, and territory in northern Cambodia.

Apr. 13. JAPAN AND RUSSIA CON-CLUDED A NEUTRALITY PACT.

July 26. All Japanese credits in the United States were "frozen" by a presidential decree. Great Britain took similar action regarding Japanese assets in that country. All armed forces in the Philippine Islands were placed under the control of the United States, with Gen. Douglas MacArthur as Commander-in-Chief in the Far East.

Aug. 17. President Roosevelt warned the Japanese ambassador, Admiral Nomura, that any further policy of military domination in Asia by the Japanese would force the United States "to take immediately any and all steps necessary" to safeguard legitimate American rights and interests. Prime Minister Winston Churchill declared a week later (Aug. 24) that Great Britain would support the United States if negotiations with Japan failed.

Oct. 17. Prince Fumumaro Konoye resigned as Japanese premier and was replaced by Gen. Hideki Tojo.

Nov. 17. Ambassador Joseph C. Grew at Tokyo cabled a warning to the United States that the Japanese might make a sudden attack.

Nov. 20. At Washington Admiral Nomura and a special Japanese envoy, Saburo Kurusu, proposed that the United States and Japan reopen trade relations and co-operate in securing the commodities of the Netherlands East Indies.

Nov. 26. Secretary Hull proposed as a basis of agreement that the Japanese withdraw their forces from China and Indo-China, recognize the territorial integrity of these countries and accept the Chinese Nationalist government. The United States and Japan could then negotiate a liberal trade treaty. Mr. Kurusu declared such proposals practically "put an end to the negotiations." Three days later (Nov. 29), Secretary Hull informed the British ambassador that diplomatic conversations between the United States and Japan had virtually broken down.

Dec. 6. President Roosevelt cabled a personal message to the Emperor of Japan urging him to use his influence to preserve peace.

Dec. 7. JAPANESE ATTACK ON PEARL HARBOR (p. 1167).

After December 7, when Japan was at war with the United States and Great Britain, the conflict in China was overshadowed by developments in the Pacific and the East Indies. Japanese conquest of Burma (1942) closed the Burma Road, the last practicable route by which military supplies could reach Chungking, for only a few tons a month could be flown in by air. Chinese armies remained in the field, and the Japanese kept an army of 1,000,000 men as an occupying force to protect towns and railway lines. The ultimate fate of these Japanese armies in Asia, and their communications with the Japanese home islands, depended upon the outcome of the war at sea.

15. THE WAR IN THE PACIFIC, 1941-1945

1941, Dec. 7. The JAPANESE SEA AND AIR FORCES LAUNCHED A SURPRISE ATTACK ON THE UNITED STATES BASE AT PEARL HARBOR, HAWAII, ON THE PHILIPPINES, and against British forces in Hongkong and Malaya. The United States forces were caught unprepared. At Hawaii five battleships and three cruisers were sunk or seriously damaged, three battleships less severely damaged, many smaller vessels sunk or crippled, and 177 aircraft destroyed. The casualties included 2343 dead, 876 missing, and 1272 injured.

Dec. 8. THE UNITED STATES DE-CLARED WAR ON JAPAN. Japanese air and naval forces attacked Guam and Wake Island. Resistance on Guam ended Dec. 13 and on Wake Island Dec. 20. Great Britain declared war on Japan.

Dec. 10. The British battleships Prince of Wales and Repulse, which had been dispatched to Singapore, were sunk by Japanese aircraft off the Malay coast.

Dec. 11. GERMANY AND ITALY DECLARED WAR ON THE UNITED STATES.

Dec. 21. A ten-year treaty of alliance was signed at Bangkok between Japan and Thailand. The Thai government agreed to aid Japan and declared war (Jan. 25, 1942) against Great Britain and the United States.

Dec. 25. British forces at Hongkong surrendered to the Japanese.

1942, Jan. 2. Manila and Cavite were captured by the Japanese. United States and Philippine forces fortified their position on Bataan Peninsula and held out until April 9. The island fort of Corregidor at the entrance to Manila Bay did not fall until May 6.

Jan. 11. Japanese forces commenced an occupation of the Netherlands East Indies, landing on Celebes, at Rabaul (Jan. 23), New Ireland (Jan. 25), the Solomon Islands (Jan. 26), and Amboina (Jan. 31).

Jan. 34-27. Allied forces sank five Japanese transports in a naval engagement in the Macassar Straits.

Feb. 15. Japanese forces, which had penetrated Malaya, captured Singapore from the north by land, taking 60,000 prisoners.

Feb. 27-Mar. 1. Battle of the Java Sea.

Naval units of the United Nations were largely destroyed, opening the way for the Japanese conquest of the East Indies. Batavia fell on Mar. 6.

Mar. 7. The British evacuated Rangoon and the Japanese rapidly occupied Burma. Lashio was taken (Apr. 30), closing the Burma Road at that point, and Mandalay fell on May 2.

Mar. 9. The conquest of Java was virtually completed by the Japanese, who had won Timor (Feb. 20) also. The growing threat to Australia was checked in the jungles of New Guinea, and Gen. Douglas MacArthur assumed command of the combined Allied forces in the southwest Pacific (Mar. 17).

May 5. To avert possible Japanese penetration, British forces landed at Diego Suarez, naval base on the north end of Madagascar, and proceeded to occupy this French colony, entering the capital, Tananarive, on Sept. 23.

May 7. BATTLE OF THE CORAL SEA. Allied naval and air power frustrated a possible Japanese invasion of Australia or the New Hebrides by destroying 100,000 tons of Japanese shipping between New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

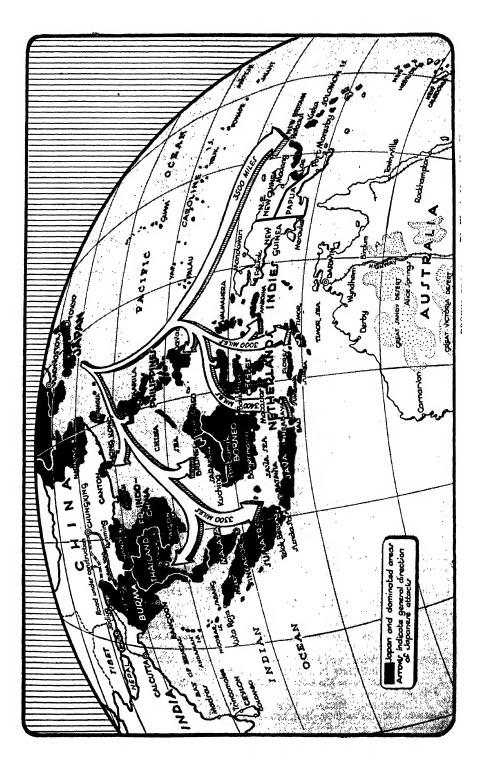

June 4-7. A Japanese naval force attacked Midway Island and was dispersed with heavy losses by United States naval and air units.

June 12. Japanese invaders occupied Attu in the Aleutian Islands and later landed on Kiska. The Japanese tide of conquest was at its height, coinciding with the German drive for the Caucasian oil fields.

July 9. The Chinese Nationalist armies won a major success over the Japanese in Kiangsi Province.

Aug. 7. United States Marines landed in the Solomon Islands. Tulagi and Japanese airfields on Guadalcanal were captured.

Nov. 12. A three-day naval battle in the Solomon Islands ended in a victory for United States forces. One Japanese battleship and five cruisers were reported sunk, and twelve transports destroyed.

1943, Mar. 4. Allied air squadrons destroyed a Japanese convoy approaching New Guinea.

July 1. Opening a concerted offensive in the South Pacific, Allied forces captured Rendova Island (July 2) while Australian troops linked up with American troops at Salamaua (July 3). The Japanese base and airfield at Munda on New Georgia Island fell Aug. 7. In September a Japanese force of 20,000 was encircled near Lae (Sept. 6-7), the airfield at Salamaua captured (Sept. 13), and Finschhafen occupied (Oct. 3). Allied forces disembarked on Bougainville Island (Oct. 31). Landing on the Gilbert Islands (Nov. 22), United States forces crushed Japanese resistance in three days' fighting, and Marines captured the important air base at Cape Gloucester on Dec. 31.

1944, Feb. 2. Invasion of the Marshall Islands. Roi was seized by the United States troops (Feb. 3), Kwajalein (Feb. 6), and an air base in Einwetok (Feb. 20). On March 1 American troops landed on the Admiralty Islands, and new landings were achieved in New Guinea (Apr. 24) at Hollandia and Altape. The Schouten group was invaded (May 28) and the Marianas (June 16).

June 16. United States Superfortress bombing planes raided the Japanese home island of Kyushu, opening a campaign of destructive attacks on Japanese cities which ended only with the Japanese capitulation.

Aug. 11. The recapture of Guam was completed. On the Indian frontier the last Japanese invaders were driven back to Burma.

Sept. 14. American forces disembarked on Morotai in the Molucca Islands, and on the Palau Islands in the Carolinas (Sept. 15).

Oct. 19. United States invasion groups, commanded by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, landed on the island of Leyte, opening the campaign for the reconquest of the Philippines.

Oct. 21-22. SECOND BATTLE OF THE PHILIPPINE SEA. The Japanese fleet, having failed to halt the invasion, withdrew from Philippine waters (Oct. 25). It had suffered 40 ships sunk, 46 damaged, and 405 planes destroyed. More United States forces were promptly landed on the island of Samos (Oct. 26).

Nov. 26. A new phase of the Pacific War opened with the initiation of raids on Japan by United States land based B-29 bombers operating from Saipan in the Mariana Islands.

1945, Feb. 19-Mar. 17. The stubborn and protracted battle for Iwo Jima gave the United States air forces a base 750 miles from Yokohama, at a cost of 19,938 American casualties, including 4198 dead.

Mar. 21. United States carrier aircraft, penetrating Japanese inland waters, attacked principal units of the Japanese fleet, damaged 15 warships and destroyed 475 planes. No United States ship was lost.

Apr. 30. In Southeast Asia the 14th
British Imperial Army (Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten), with support from United States and Chinese forces, completed the destruction in fifteen months of the Japanese 15th, 28th, and 33d armies.
Total Japanese casualties were set (May 5) at 347,000.

Apr. 1. United States Marines and army troops invaded Okinawa. An attempt by the Japanese fleet to check this amphibious operation resulted in the sinking by American aircraft (Apr. 7) of the Japanese battleship Yamato (45,000 tons), 2 cruisers, and 3 destroyers. The last bitter resistance on Okinawa did not end until June 21, but the island provided an airbase 325 miles from Japanese cities.

May-Aug. In the greatest air offensive in history United States land-based and carrier-based aircraft destroyed or immobilized the remnants of the Japanese navy, shattered Japanese industry, and curtailed Japanese sea communications by submarine and air attack and extensive minefields. United States battleships moved in to shell densely populated cities with impunity and the Twentieth Air Force dropped 40,000 tons of bombs on Japanese industrial centers in one month.

After the collapse of Germany in May (p. 1165) the Japanese were left without allies, and the British and American resources in men and material were redirected toward the Pacific theater of war. Japanese strength was already half-broken and Japanese morale was beginning to disintegrate when two terrible strokes within one week hastened the conclusion of the war.

Aug. 6. AN ATOMIC BOMB, secretly prepared by British and American scientists, was dropped on the Japanese city of Hiroshima with obliterating effect. The city was three-fifths destroyed.

Aug. 8. SOVIET RUSSIA DECLARED WAR ON JAPAN and commenced a powerful invasion of Manchuria. 1170

Aug. 10. The Japanese cabinet decided to make an offer of surrender. The Allied terms of capitulation were communicated to Tokyo and accepted four days later (Aug. 14). United States forces of occupation landed in Japan on Aug. 26.

Sept. 2. The FORMAL TERMS OF SURRENDER WERE SIGNED by the Japanese officials and military leaders on board the U.S.S. Missouri in Tokyo Bay. Capitulation terms for Japanese forces in China, estimated at 1,000,000 men, were signed in Nanking (Sept. 9) by Japanese commanders and representatives of Generalissimo Chiang K'ai-shek.

16. THE ORGANIZATION OF PEACE

The League of Nations, formed at Versailles in 1919, failed to curb powerful aggressors or to protect its weaker members from attack. It was never a well-balanced, truly supra-national league, and proved itself unfitted to deal with economic problems or to enforce its decisions. When the Second World War opened in 1939, the League of Nations had lost almost all its prestige and influence.

The international anarchy, repudiation of treaties, acts of aggression, and final outbreak of a general war, which marked the 1930's, brought home to peaceful nations the need for an organization better adapted to adjust international tensions and disputes.

Three projects for international federation took form in the war years 1939-45. In Europe, Germany, Italy, and their satellite states forged an anti-Comintern, anti-democratic bloc which Adolf Hitler called his "New Order." In Asia and the East Indies the Japanese extended their power over a widening area, which they termed a "Co-prosperity Sphere" and in which they promulgated the doctrine of Asia for the Asiatics. Both the German and the Japanese hegemony had contracted and finally collapsed in defeat by the summer of 1945.

The third international federation formed in the war years came to be known as the United Nations Organization. It was based ideologically upon the foundations of the Atlantic Charter (p. 1137), structurally upon the wartime solidarity of the "Big Three," Britain, Russia, and the United States, and financially upon the credits (43 billion dollars) made available to nations which opposed the Axis by the Lend-Lease policy of the United States government. The victory of the United Nations, achieved in large measure through the effective mobilization of world resources, left their leaders in a position to write the peace treaties.

1943, Nov. 9. The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration held its first session at Atlantic City. This international body, organized by the representatives of 44 nations, was created to aid countries which had been subjugated by the Axis powers. Its staff was intended to form in effect "an international civil service."

1944, Apr. A United Nations Organization for Educational and Cultural Reconstruction was proposed by the ministers of education from the Allied countries, meeting in London.

July 1-22. A United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference (Bretton Woods Conference) met for three weeks of discussion. To improve world economic conditions, the delegates of the United Nations proposed to create an International Monetary Fund and an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the first with a credit of $8,800,000,000, the second with a capital of $10,000,000,000. The major purpose was to avert currency disorders and stabilize exchange rates, and the plans, worked out by the financial experts of 44 nations, were referred to the governments concerned for approval.

Sept. 16-26. The Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration held its second session, at Montreal. The allotment of $50,000,000 to Italy, partly for medical supplies, marked the first extension of aid by the United Nations to a former enemy country. Plans were laid to provide for a budget of $11,500,000 for 1945, by assessing member states. Whether UNRRA supplies and administrators would be admitted to countries liberated by the Russian armies remained undecided.

Oct. 9. Dumbarton Oaks Conference.

Delegates representing the United States, the British Commonwealth, and the Soviet Union, after meeting from Aug. 21 to Sept. 27, published proposals for a permanent international organization to be known as the United Nations. The aim of the new society of nations was the preservation of world peace and security.

1945, Apr. 25-June 26. SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE. Delegates of 50 nations met at San Francisco to complete a Charter for the United Nations Organization. A preliminary draft was submitted to the Conference on June 22 by the United States Secretary of State Edward R. Stettinius. It provided for four organs in the new body: (1) a General Assembly as the major policy shaping forum; (2) a Security Council to supervise military and political problems; (3) an Economic and Social Council to deal with problems of economic and social conflict; and (4) an International Court of Justice for the adjustment of inter-The administrative national disputes. work of the United Nations Organization was to be handled by a general Secretariat directed by a Secretary General.

July 17-Aug. 2. POTSDAM CONFER-ENCE. President Harry S. Truman for the United States, Prime Minister Winston Churchill for Great Britain, and Generalissimo J. V. Stalin for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics met in Berlin to confer on plans for re-establishing peace. After July 28, Mr. Clement R. Attlee, head of the new British Labor Cabinet, replaced Mr. Churchill at the Conference. An agreement was reached that a Council of Foreign Ministers, representing the United States, Great Britain, Russia, France, and China, should be established to continue the task of drafting peace settlements. This Council held its first session in London (Sept. 11).

For Germany the decisions reached at the Potsdam Conference implied: (1) disarmament and demilitarization; (2) dissolution of National Socialist institutions; (3) trial of war criminals; (4) encouragement of democratic ideals; (5) restoration of local self-government and democratic political parties; (6) freedom of speech, press, and religion, subject to the requirements of military security.

Economic restrictions drafted by the Conference for Germany included: (1) prohibition of the manufacture of war materials and implements of war; (2) controlled production of metals, chemicals, and machinery essential to war; (3) decentralization of German cartels, syndicates, and trusts; (4) emphasis upon agriculture and peaceful domestic industries; (5) control of exports, imports, and scientific research. The methods whereby the victors would enforce these conditions were to be worked out in detail later.

The Conference further ordained "that Germany be compelled to compensate to the greatest possible extent for the loss and suffering that she has caused to the United Nations..." The members of the Conference agreed in principle on the disposal of the German navy and merchant marine, but in this matter likewise the details were not worked out.

Peace treaties with Finland, Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, and Italy were to be drawn up as promptly as possible.

Sept. 2. FORMAL TERMS OF SUR-RENDER were signed by the Japanese civil and military envoys at Tokyo. The Japanese home islands were placed under the rule of a United States army of occupation, but the Emperor remained at the head of the state and the Japanese political and police officials continued to fulfill their functions. The high command and the military organizations were progressively disbanded. American forces also occupied island possessions regained or newly captured in the Pacific Ocean.

Korea became a trusteeship of the United Nations. The Kurile Islands and the southern part of Sakhalin were ceded to Russia, Outer Mongolia was recognized as part of the Soviet sphere of control, and Russia shared with China the facilities and supervision of Port Arthur and the Manchurian railroads. China regained soverignty over Inner Mongolia and Manchuria, as well as the islands of Formosa and Hainan. Hongkong was reoccupied by the British, who likewise accepted the formal surrender at Singapore (Sept. 12) of all Japanese forces (585,000 men) in Southeast Asia and the East Indies.
